There are cases where it is not unlikely that the distances on the sea spoken of were measured as land miles, as parts of land miles, instances of measurements upon or near the shore, or measurements in rods or feet, cases resting upon peculiar facts. #### Title to land below high-water line is in the State.

A person acquiring land abutting on a navigable stream takes title only to the high-water line, and that line is limited by the outflow of the medium high tide between the spring and neap tides. All below that line belongs to the State. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 393.

Title to land under water, and to the shore below ordinary high-water mark, in navigable rivers and arms of the sea, was, by common law, vested in the sovereign. Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324 (24 L. ed. 224); Smith v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 220.

Anders, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case this court is called upon for the first time to determine the rights of littoral proprietors of lands abutting upon the shore of an arm of the sea in which the tide ebbs and flows.

And while it is scarcely necessary to look beyond our own Constitution and laws for authority to guide us to a conclusion, still, owing to the importance of the questions both to individuals and the public, and the magnitude of the interests involved, we have examined the numerous authorities cited by the learned counsel for the respective parties in the elaborate briefs which they have filed, in order that we might familiarize ourselves with the decisions of other courts upon the subject and with the reasons upon which their decisions are based.

We shall not attempt, however, to review all of the decisions in detail for that would be impracticable, if it were desirable, but will only refer to a few of the cases especially cited by counsel.

In this State the common law is our rule of decision in the settlement of questions requiring judicial determination when not specially provided for by statute, and it seems to be generally conceded that, at common law, the title to the soil under water was vested in the crown. The ownership of the soil was regarded as a jus privatum, and could be conveyed to individuals, subject only to the public right of navigation and fishing, which public right was under the absolute control of Parliament. In this country we have the highest authority in support of the doctrine that the State has succeeded to all the rights of both king and Parliament, and hence is the absolute owner of all navigable waters and the soil under them within its territorial limits.

This question was thoroughly discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 867, 10 L. ed. 997. That was an action of eject-

A deed, by an individual, of property including a stream in which the tide ebbs and flows, and the land under which therefore belongs to the State, will not convey the bed of the stream beyond high-water mark. Roberts v. Baumgarten, 110 N. Y. 380.

The owner of land abutting on a navigable stream takes title only to the high-water line, and that is limited by the outflow of the minimum high tide between the spring and neap tides. New Jersey Z. & I. Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 398; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74.

By the laws of Pennsylvania the riparian owners along the large rivers of that State own only to the bank, and have no exclusive right to the soil or water of such rivers to the middle thread of the water. Rundle v. Delaware & R. Co. 55 U. S. 14 How. 80, 14 L. ed. 335.

High-water mark, or the dividing line between the proprietors of lands bordering on a navigable stream and the State is the point beyond which the presence and action of water are so common and usual and so long continued in all ordinary years as to mark upon the soil a character distinct from that of the banks in respect to vegetation, as well as in respect to the soil itself. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 5 L. R. A. 559, 53 Ark. 314.

Hence the holder under a United States patent of land bordering on such river cannot maintain an action to recover damages for the removal of gravel from the river bed in front of his land below high-water mark. Ibid.

Establishment of dock and harbor lines.

A body of water need not be landlocked in order to be a "haven" or "harbor." Huntington v. Lowndes, 40 Fed. Rep. 625.

Huntington Bay, a body of water lying between Lloyd's Neck and Eaton's Neck, on the north side 12 L. R. A.

of Long Island, in the State of New York, is a "haven" or "harbor," within the meaning of the language in the Colonial Patents of 1666, 1688 and 1694. Ibid.

The establishment of a dock or harbor line in pursuance of legislative authority is to be construed as giving to the owners of the upland the privilege of filling in and building out to such line. Miller v. Mendenhall, 8 L. R. A. 89, 43 Minn. 95.

The Statute giving to the harbor commissioners the care and supervision of the tide-waters and the flats, confers no additional rights upon adjacent or contiguous proprietors. Henry v. Newburyport, 5 L. R. A. 179, 149 Mass. 532.

The power of the City of Astoria over the subject of the erection of a wharf within the city limits, in front of the shore of the Columbia River, is confined to the establishing of a wharf line. McCann v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 18 Or. 455.

The deposit of refuse matter in the channel of the Hudson River opposite Newburgh is within waters tributary to New York Harbor, within the meaning of the Act of Congress of June 30, 1838, prohibiting injurious deposits within that harbor or adjacent and tributary waters. United States v. The Sadie, 41 Fed. Rep. 396.

Harbor commissioners; supervision of tide-waters on flats. See note to Henry v. Newburyport (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 179.

Littoral proprietors; extent of right and title.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that the owner of land bordering on the seashore holds only to ordinary high-water mark, and that all the seashore fronting his land lying between high and low water mark is the property of the State. Long Beach Land & Water Co. v. Richardson, 70 Cal. 204.

In the Massachusetts Colonial Ordinance of 1647, ment for land under the waters of Haritan Bay, in New Jersey, over which the tide ebbed and flowed. The land in controversy was included in a large tract which was granted by the King of Great Britain to the Duke of York, and subsequently became vested in the proprietors of East Jersey, who afterwards surrendered to the crown all their governmental powers, but retained all their rights of private property. One of the parties to the action as the grantees of the State of New Jersey, under a law of the State, claimed the exclusive right to take oysters in the place granted, and the other claimed the same right by virtue of his title from the proprietors. The right of the crown to make the grant to the Duke of York, which not only included the tide land, and also the waters, and soil under the waters, as well as the power of the State to convey the same, were questions thus brought directly before the court for determination. And it was held that the king as the representative of the nation had an unquestionable right to make the grant to the Duke of York with all the prerogatives and powers of government therein contained. In discussing the question as to whether, since Magna Charta, the king had power to grant land covered by navigable waters to any individual so as to give him an exclusive right of fishing within the limit of the grant, Mr. Chief Justice Taney said: "And we the more willingly forbear to express an opinion on this subject because it has ceased to be of much interest in the United States. For, when the Revolution took place, the people of each State became themselves sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government. A grant made by their authority must therefore manifestly be tried and determined by different principles from those which apply to the grants of the British crown."

The natural and logical conclusion of the court was, that the grant by the State conferred upon its grantees the exclusive right to take oysters within the territory covered by the grant.

The question of the ownership of lands under tide-waters was again raised in the same court in the case of Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565, which was ejectment for a lot of land in the City of Mobile, in Alabama, which lay below high-water mark, and which had been granted to plaintiff by Congress. After approving the decision in the case of Martin v. Waddell, Mr. Justice McKinley, in the course of his opinion, says:

"Then to Alabama belong the navigable waters and the soil under them in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States; and no compact that might be made between her and the United States could diminish or enlarge those rights."

The court further says that "by the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: first, the shores which declares that in all places about and upon salt water, where the sea ebbs and flows, the proprietor of the land adjoining shall have propriety "to the low-water mark," the words "to the low-water mark" mean to the extreme low-water mark. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. v. Boston Water-Power Co. 6 New Eng. Rep. 323, 147 Mass. 61; Sparhawk v. Bullard, 1 Met. 96; Atty-Gen. v. Boston Wharf Co. 12 Gray, 553; Wonsou v. Wonsou, 14 Allen, 71; Atty-Gen. v. Woods, 103 Mass. 436. See note to Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 8 L. R. A. 90.

The common-law doctrine prevailing in England has been adopted in most, if not all, of the New England States, and was in the early cases in New York in force in that State (see Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow. 518); but it was modified and finally overruled in subsequent cases, and the better doctrine of the civil law adopted. See People v. Canal Appraisers, 33 N. Y. 461; McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Iowa, 1.

The title of the littoral owners bordering on the seashore, and appurtenant rights in the shore and mud flats between high and low water mark are separable, and either may be conveyed separately. See note to Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 8 L. R. A. 92.

Tide lands; ownership of.

An owner of land situated in the vicinity of tide-water has not the right to have the water flow over the premises of others owning flats or the shore between high and low-water marks to his own land. Henry v. Newburyport, 5 L. R. A. 179, 149 Mass. 582.

Tide lands applies to those lands adjoining main lands, and periodically covered and uncovered by the rising and falling tides. Hobson v. Monteith, 15 Or. 251.

To be tidal water it is not necessary that water should be salt, but the spot must be one where the tide, in the ordinary course of things, flows and reflows. Reece v. Miller, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 680.

Qualified property in water-front.

At common law a littoral proprietor and a riparian owner have a qualified property in the water frontage belonging by nature to their land, which includes the right of access over an extension of their water fronts to navigable water, and the right to construct wharves, piers, or landings and fish houses, although the effect of doing so will be to shut off access by the adjoining owners to wharves on that side. Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 139.

He is entitled to fill in and make improvements in shallow waters in front of his land to the line of navigability; and his rights therein can be interfered with only by the State for public purposes. Miller v. Mendenhall, 8 L. R. A. 89, and note, 43 Minn. 95.

This right is subject only to the limitation that he shall not interfere with the public right of navigation. Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23, 17 L. ed. 29; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 964; Fulmer v. Williams, 1 L. R. A. 603, 122 Pa. 191.

No one but the riparian proprietor has the right to improve and occupy such premises for private purposes, and it does not concern others how or to what particular purpose the reclaimed premises may be devoted so long as there is no violation of the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 7 L. R. A. 725, 43 Minn. 104.

The right of the riparian owner on navigable streams to erect wharves and piers is appurtenant to his ownership, subject, however, to governmental control. See note to Parker v. West Coast Packing Co. (Or.) 5 L. R. A. 61.

The paramount common right of navigation is not confined to the channel of a waterway but extends to high-water mark in tide-waters and tidal of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution of the United States but were reserved to the States respectively; second, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States; third, the right of the United States to public lands and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof, conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the lands in controversy in this case."

Again in the case of Weber v. Board of Harbor Comrs., 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 57, 31 L. ed. 798, it was held that to the State of California upon her admission into the Union passed the absolute property in and dominion over all soils under tide-water within her limits, with the consequent right to dispose of the title to any part thereof in such manner as the State might deem proper, subject to the paramount right of navigation over the waters so far as such navigation might be required by the necessities of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, the regulation of which was vested in the general government. (Opinion of Mr. Justice Field, at page 65, 801.)

The court went still further in the case of McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 891, 24 L. ed. 848, and there held that not only the soil under tide-waters, in the State, but the waters themselves and the fish in the waters, so far as they are capable of ownership, belonged to the State, and that the Legislature had the constitutional right to pass a law prohibiting any person not a citizen of the State from fishing in such waters. And in Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 413, the court sustained an Act of the Legislature of Delaware authorizing the damming up of a navigable stream for the benefit of adjoining lands.

The case of Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 124 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 548, was an action of ejectment for land occupied by the railroad company along the margin of the Hudson River. Plaintiff claimed by dedication of the street to the water by the original proprietor of the land, as evidenced by the "Loss" map. Defendant claimed by virtue of a grant from the State. Mr. Justice Matthews, speaking for the court, said: "The nature of the title in the State to lands under tide-water was thoroughly considered by the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey in the case of Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co., 84 N. J. L. 582; it was there declared, p. 549, 'that all navigable waters within the territorial limits of the State, and the soil under such waters, belong in actual propriety to the public; that the riparian owner by the common law has no peculiar rights in this public domain as incidents of his estate, and that the privileges he possesses by the local custom or by force of the Wharf Act, to acquire such rights, can, before possession has been taken, be regulated or revoked at the will of the Legislature. The result is, that there is no legal obstacle to a grant by the Legislature to the defendants of that part of the property of the public which streams. See note to Wright v. Mulvaney (Wis.) 9 L. R. A. 807.

Title to islands in river; law of accretion.

The title to land acquired by accretion is a title acquired under the operation of the law of the State, which each State determines for itself. Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 824, 24 L. ed. 224; St. Louis v. Rutz, 128 U. S. 220, 34 L. ed. 951.

The owner in fee of the bed of a river, or other submerged land, is the owner of any bar island or dry land which subsequently may be formed thereon. Mulry v. Norton, 1 Cent. Rep. 748, 100 N. Y. 424; St. Louis v. Rutz, supra.

The Arsenal Island was "a mere moving mass of alluvial deposits." To such a movable island, traveling for more than a mile and from one State to another, the law of title by accretion can have no application, for its progress is not imperceptible in a legal sense. St. Louis v. Rutz, supra.

The right of accretion to an island in a river cannot be so extended lengthwise of the river as to exclude riparian proprietors above or below such island from access to the river, as such riparian proprietors. St. Louis v. Rutz, 128 U. S. 126, 34 L. ed. 941.

The owner of an island between two channels of a river, which, by a change in the course of the channels, has gradually pushed up stream as the result of natural accretions, is entitled to the accretions, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 1014, which is merely declaratory of the law as it has always been. Fillmore v. Jennings, 78 Cal. 684.

The Enabling Act of April 18, 1818 (3 Stat. 490, § 2), under which Illinois was organized as a State and admitted into the Union, made "the middle of the Mississippi River" the western boundary of the State. The Enabling Act of March 3, 1820 (3 Stat. 19 L. R. A.

545, § 2), under which Missouri was organized as a State and admitted into the Union, made the "middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River" the eastern boundary of Missouri, so far as its boundary line was coterminous with the western boundary of Illinois. It has been held by the Supreme Court of Illinois (Buttenth v. St. Louis Bridge Co., 14 West. Rep. 651, 128 Ill. 686) that these two Enabling Acts are to be construed as in pari materia, and that the common boundary line between Missouri and Illinois is the "middle of the main channel of the Mississippi River." The "middle of the main channel of the Mississippi" has been constantly treated as the eastern boundary of the State of Missouri. Jones v. Soulard, 65 U. S. 84 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 604; The Schools v. Riskey, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 91, 19 L. ed. 860; St. Louis v. Rutz, 128 U. S. 220, 34 L. ed. 960.

It follows that an island in the Mississippi River, in its course between Illinois and Missouri, must lie wholly in one of those States or the other, because the main channel of the river must run on one side or the other of such island. St. Louis v. Rutz, supra.

The right of accretion to an island in the river cannot be so extended lengthwise of the river as to exclude riparian proprietors above or below such island from access to the river, as such riparian proprietors. Mulry v. Norton, 1 Cent. Rep. 748, 100 N. Y. 424, 430, 437; St. Louis v. Rutz, supra.

If an island in a non-navigable stream results from accretion, it belongs to the owner of the bank on the same side of the flum aqua. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 423, 428; 2 Sharswood, Bl. Com. 261, note; 3 Kent, Com. 428; Kinggrave, Law Trials, 5; Hale, De Jure Maris, 14; King v. Yarborough, 8 Barn. & C. 91, 107; Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow. 587, note; Ingraham v. Wilkinson, 4 Pick. 268; Deerfield v. Arms, 17 Pick. 41; Woodbury v. Short, 17 Vt. 297.

lies in front of the lands of the plaintiff, and which is below high-water mark."

"It was therefore held in that case that it was competent for the legislative power of the State to grant to a stranger lands constituting the shore of a navigable river under tide-water, below the high-water mark, to be occupied and used with structures and improvements in such a manner as to cut off the access of a riparian owner from his land to the water, and without making compensation to him for such loss." And again: "Our conclusion therefore is that the grants from the State of New Jersey, under which the defendants claim, respectively, are a complete bar to the recovery sought against them in these suits." And finally, "Under those grants they have and hold the rightful and exclusive possession of the premises in controversy against the adverse claims of the plaintiff to any easement or right of way upon and over them, by virtue of the original dedication of the streets to high-water mark on the Loss map."

The foregoing decisions of the highest judicial tribunal of the United States, without other or further authority, would seem to settle, beyond controversy, the question of title to the tide lands of this State, and to leave no doubt whatever that they belong to the State in actual propriety and that the State has full power to dispose of the same, subject to no restrictions, save those imposed upon the Legislature by the Constitution of the State and the Constitution of the United States. And if this be true, it necessarily follows that no individual can have any legal right whatever to claim any easement in, or to impose any servitude upon, the tide-waters within the limits of the State, without the consent of the Legislature.

But in order that there might be no doubt upon this vexed question, the Constitution of the State has spoken upon the subject. Section 1 of article 17 of that instrument declares that "the State of Washington asserts its ownership to the beds and shores of all navigable waters in the State up to and including the line of ordinary high tide in the waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and up to and including the line of ordinary high water within the banks of all navigable rivers and lakes; provided that this section shall not be construed so as to debar any person from asserting his claim to vested rights in the courts of the State." And, so jealous were the people of the State in guarding their rights in these lands, that they inserted a proviso in the Constitution to the effect that no law of Washington Territory granting shore or tide lands to any person, company or any municipal or private corporation, should be deemed valid. Const. art. 17, § 2.

Appellee contends, however, that whatever may be the title of the State to the soil under tide-water, he, by virtue of his contiguity to

Title by discovery, in United States government.

Islands discovered by a citizen of the United States become the property of the United States government. United States Rev. Stat. chap. 72; Duncan v. Navassa Phosphate Co. 137 U. S. 647, 34 L. ed. 827.

The Guano Islands Act of Congress of 1856 makes the island of Navassa part of the United States. Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202, 34 L. ed. 601.

The whole right conferred by the Guano Islands Act Aug. 18, 1856, upon the discoverer of an island and his assigns is a license to occupy the island for the purpose of removing the guano. This right cannot last after the guano is removed. Duncan v. Navassa Phosphate Co. supra.

Riparian rights.

Riparian rights are settled by the States themselves. St. Louis v. Myers, 113 U. S. 536, 28 L. ed. 1181; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224; Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 63; Dana v. Jackson Street Wharf Co. 81 Cal. 118; Martin v. O'Brien, 34 Miss. 21; Case v. Loftus, 5 L. R. A. 684, 39 Fed. Rep. 730.

Among rights of a riparian owner are access to the navigable part of the river from the front of his land, and the right to make a landing, wharf or pier for his own use or the use of the public. Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23, 17 L. ed. 29; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 273, 19 L. ed. 74; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 504, 19 L. ed. 984, 986; St. Louis v. Ruiz, 138 U. S. 226, 34 L. ed. 949.

A current is not essential to the existence of riparian rights, as water may be navigable with or without a current. Turner v. Holland, 8 West. Rep. 801, 65 Mich. 453.

Rights of owners in various States.

Arkansas.

Owners of land bordering on a river are entitled to compensation for damages suffered by reason of 12 L. R. A.

their riparian rights having become less valuable on account of railroad tracks and other improvements, but can claim nothing on account of the running of a transfer boat, where they have no ferry license. Organ v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235.

California.

The Sacramento River being navigable in fact, the title of the riparian owner extends no further than the edge of the stream. Lux v. Haggis, 69 Cal. 255.

Colorado.

Though the charter of a corporation may be ineffectual to convey an exclusive right, or any other right, to the waters of a river in Colorado, it is entitled to the protection of its rights in the water to the extent of its actual appropriation. Platte Valley Co. v. Northern Colorado Irrigation Co. 12 Colo. 525.

Delaware.

A riparian proprietor or owner of land fronting upon a navigable river holds to the low-water mark. Harlan & H. Co. v. Paschall, 5 Del. Ch. 435.

District of Columbia.

The United States became the riparian proprietor, and succeeded to all the riparian rights by becoming the owner in fee simple absolute of Water Street, in Washington, a strip of land that adjoined the river, and owned the right of wharfage appurtenant to it, although the land was granted for a street. Potomac S. B. Co. v. Upper Potomac S. B. Co. 109 U. S. 672, 37 L. ed. 1070.

Illinois.

A riparian owner on a navigable stream cannot maintain a suit at common law against public agents to recover consequential damages resulting from obstructing a stream in pursuance of legislative authority, unless that authority has been transcended, or unless there was a wanton injury in-the water, has certain rights in the shore beyond those of the general public, and which are peculiar to himself, among which are a right to wharf out opposite to his upland, a right of ferriage, a right of unobstructed access to the navigable water in front of him, and a further right to accretions that may hereafter be found, and that all of these rights are property and are "vested rights." And in support of his contention the learned counsel for appellee have cited many authorities, among which are Dutton v. Strong, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 23, 17 L. ed. 29; St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 272, 19 L. ed. 74; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984.

But before proceeding further it may be proper here to observe that riparian rights in the several States are settled by the respective States for themselves. See St. Louis v. Myers, 118 U. S. 566, 28 L. ed. 1181; Barnes v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224; Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412.

In Dutton v. Strong, supra, cited by appellee as an authority in favor of his right to wharf out against his premises, the facts before the court were as follows: The defendant in the court below had constructed a landing, or bridge pier, in front of his premises extending to the navigable waters of the lake; plaintiff's vessel was moored to this pier in a storm, and, by force of the gale, was about to pull down and destroy defendant's structure, when he, after requesting the master of the vessel to detach the same, but who refused to do so, cut the hawser, whereby the ship was set adrift and sank. Plaintiff sued for the resulting damage. The court held that the defendant had a right to erect the pier where it was, and to protect the same by cutting the vessel's fastenings, even although it was thereby exposed to destruction. Speaking of the origin of riparian rights in this country, Mr. Justice Clifford said: "Our ancestors when they immigrated here undoubtedly brought the common law with them, as a part of their inheritance; but they soon found it indispensable, in order to secure these conveniences, to sanction the appropriation of the soil, between high and low water, to the accomplishment of these objects. Different States adopted different regulations upon the subject; and in some the right of the riparian proprietor rests upon immemorial usage. No reason is perceived why the same general principle should not be applicable to the lakes, although these waters are not affected by the ebb and flow of the tide."

We have no doubt of the correctness of that decision, and this court would undoubtedly follow it in a similar case.

The case of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, supra, involved the title to land on the Mississippi River at St. Paul. Schurmeier's premises were bounded by high-water mark of the river, but the land in front had been filled in and built upon down to extreme low-water mark; and it was held that he had a right as riparian proprietor to the reclaimed land as against the railroad company. And at page 289, Mr. Justice Clifford said: "Allicted, or carelessness, negligence or want of skill in causing the obstruction. Northern Transp. Co. of O. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. ed. 835.

Iowa.

In Iowa it is unlawful for any person or corporation to construct or operate any railroad or other obstruction between the shore and the river, without compensation to the shore-owners. Davenport & N. R. Co. v. Renwick, 102 U. S. 180, 26 L. ed. 51.

Massachusetts.

The owner of lands not accessible by navigation from the sea has no cause of complaint because of being deprived, by the erection of wharves or by the filling up of flats, of the ebb and flow of the tide to his premises, or the right thereby to drain over the lands of others. Henry v. Newburyport, 5 L. R. A. 179, 149 Mass. 582.

Michigan.

Where plaintiff leased a water lot to defendant only to furnish a water front upon which defendant could store its boats and launch and land the same unobstructed, his subsequent obstruction of defendant's access is an eviction and defeats his right to claim rent during the continuance of the obstruction. Pridgeon v. Excelsior Boat Club, 9 West Rep. 211, 66 Mich. 326.

Missouri.

The Act of Congress providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union left the rights of riparian owners on the Mississippi River to be settled according to the principles of state law. St. Louis v. Myers, 118 U. S. 566, 28 L. ed. 1181.

New Jersey.

The acquisition, by a railroad or canal company, 12 L. R. A.

of an easement, for a right of way, over the land of a riparian owner, along or on the shore of his land, does not, according to general principles of law, deprive such owner of his right or equity to preserve or improve the connection of his land with the adjacent tidewater. New Jersey Zinc & Iron Co. v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 44 N. J. Eq. 398.

The title to the land taken remains in such cases in the owner, subject only to such servitude as the corporation has power to impose; and their power in this respect is limited, as a general rule, to such use of the land as may be reasonably necessary for a right of way. Taylor v. New York & Long Branch R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 28; 1 Redf. Railroads, 270.

Entry upon land of another and appropriating it to its own use neither constitutes a trespass nor gives the owner a right to maintain an action of ejectment against them. Kough v. Darcey, 11 N. J. L. 281; Den v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 24 N. J. L. 587; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. McFarland, 81 N. J. Eq. 708, 48 N. J. L. 605.

Pennsylvania.

In Pennsylvania the test by which the character of a stream as public or private is determined is its navigability in fact. Fulmer v. Williams, 1 L. R. A. 603, 122 Pa. 191.

The common-law doctrine was never recognized in this State. Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Kirk, 46 Pa. 112.

As between themselves, riparian owners on a navigable stream are owners of the soil, and are bound to observe the obligations that grow out of their ownership and their proximity, so as not to injure just rights. Fulmer v. Williams, supra.

Riparian rights of owners on natural streams. See note to Whitney v. Wheeler Cotton Mills (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 613.

though such riparian proprietors are limited to the stream, still they also have the same right to construct suitable landings and wharves, for the convenience of commerce and navigation, as is accorded riparian proprietors bordering on navigable waters affected by the ebb and flow of the tide."

But it will be remembered that the same learned judge said in Dutton v. Strong that different States adopted different regulations upon the subject. And no doubt the decision of the case was in no way in conflict with the "regulations" of Minnesota.

The question before the court in Yates v. Milwaukee was as to the validity of an ordinance of the City of Milwaukee declaring a wharf belonging to Yates a nuisance. And it was remarked by Mr. Justice Miller, in speaking generally of riparian rights on navigable streams, that whether the title of such owner extended beyond the dry land or not, he has the right of access to the navigable part of the river, and to make a landing, wharf or pier for his own use or that of the public, subject to such general rules and regulations as the Legislature may see proper to impose for the protection of the rights of the public, whatever they may be, and that it is a valuable right and property, and a right of which, when once vested, the owner can only be deprived in accordance with established law, and, if necessary that it be taken for the public good, upon due compensation.

But if the court in these cases really intended to say that the same rule applied to the shore of the sea, or the arms of the sea, and that a riparian proprietor has a right, as against the State, to erect wharves extending below high-water mark, we cannot see how these can be reconciled with other decisions of the court, especially with that of Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra. But it would seem, however, that the court in the later case of Weber v. Board of Harbor Comrs., supra, did make a distinction between tidal and non-tidal waters. For, in that case, Mr. Justice Field, after approving the doctrine laid down in Yates v. Milwaukee, says: "Nor is it necessary to controvert the proposition that in several of the States, by general legislation or immemorial usage, the proprietor whose land is bounded by the shore of the sea, or of an arm of the sea, possesses a similar right to erect a wharf or pier in front of his land, extending into the waters to the point where they are navigable. In the absence of such legislation or usage, however, the common-law rule would govern the rights of the proprietor, at least in those States where the common law obtains. By that law the title to the shore of the sea and of the arms of the sea and under tide-waters is, in England, in the King, in this country, in the State. Any erection thereon without license is therefore deemed an encroachment upon the property of the sovereign, or, as it is termed, in the language of the law, a purpresture which he may remove at pleasure, whether it tend to obstruct navigation or otherwise."

We think the above is a correct statement of the law applicable to riparian rights on tide-waters, and that it is fully supported by the authorities. Gould, Waters, § 187, and cases cited; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53; Dana v. Jackson Street Wharf Co. 31 Cal. 118; Martin v. O'Brien, 34 Mass. 21.

And in this connection it must not be forgotten that, in the cases of Dutton v. Strong, St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier and Yates v. Milwaukee, as well as that of Case v. Loftus, 39 Fed. Rep. 730, 5 L. R. A. 684, also cited by counsel, the respective riparian proprietors had already erected their improvements, presumably with the license of the State, and therefore had vested rights of property which it was proper to recognize and protect.

This seems to have been the view of Mr. Gould, for, in a note to section 149 of his work on Waters, in which he quotes from the opinion of the court in the case of Yates v. Milwaukee, he uses this language: "In this case the wharf which it was attempted to condemn as a nuisance was actually built."

In Ravenwood v. Flemings, 22 W. Va. 52, 46 Am. Rep. 485, which is a well-considered case, it was held, under a law of that State, that a riparian proprietor on a navigable river had no right to build a wharf, ferry or bulk-head, below high-water mark, without the consent of the town council, and that he might be prevented from so doing by injunction.

And in Com. v. Alger, supra, the court, in a most learned and elaborate opinion by Chief Justice Shaw, sustained an indictment against the defendant for extending a wharf beyond the harbor line in the City of Boston, on his own land, and further, that the Statute establishing harbor lines, and taking away the right of proprietors of flats in the harbor beyond the lines, to build wharves thereon, even when they would be no injury to navigation, and providing for no compensation to such proprietor, was not unconstitutional as taking private property for public uses without compensation.

We think the authorities abundantly show that a riparian proprietor on the shore of the sea, or its arms, has no rights, as against the State, or its grantees, to extend wharves in front of his land below high-water mark. But if this were not so, we would still be constrained to hold that appellee has no such rights, for the Constitution of the State, which is the supreme law of the land, expressly declares that the Legislature shall provide for the appointment of a commission, whose duty it shall be to locate and establish harbor lines in the navigable waters of all harbors of the State, whenever such navigable waters lie within or in front of the incorporated limits of any city, or within one mile thereof, upon either side; and further, that the Legislature shall provide general laws for the leasing of the right to build wharves, docks and other structures, upon certain designated areas, or the Legislature may provide by general laws for the building and maintaining, upon such area, wharves, docks and other structures. Const. art. 15.

Nor can the right to wharf out be claimed under the Act of the Territorial Legislature authorizing bank owners to build wharves in front of their premises. That Act was but a license at most, and, until availed of, was revocable; and the Constitution and subsequent laws have abrogated the law.

But appellee claims that he has a vested right to future accretions to his land, and cites, as authority to sustain his position, the case of St. Clair v. Livingston, 90 U. S. 23 Wall. 46, 23 L. ed. 59. And the court in that case does say that the riparian right of future accretions is a vested right. But we are unable to see how one can have a present vested right to that which does not exist, and which may never have an existence. It seems to us that the more reasonable doctrine is announced in the case of Taylor v. Underhill, 40 Cal. 471, in which case the court says: "The plaintiff as a riparian owner has also a right to accretions to his land, and it is said the claim of defendant will be a cloud upon his title to such accretions, but as yet there is no such property and there may never be. He cannot ask the court to interfere in advance to prevent a cloud being cast upon his title to that which may never have an existence."

The case of Davenport & N. W. R. Co. v. Renwick, 102 U. S. 180, 26 L. ed. 51, cited by appellee, was an action for damages by a riparian proprietor on account of the building of a railroad along the Mississippi River in front of his premises. The court held that the plaintiff could recover, but placed its decision upon a Statute of Iowa (1874) providing for compensation to riparian owners in such cases. Previous to this Statute, it was held in the case of McManus v. Carmichael, 8 Iowa, 1, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, that the title of riparian owner extended only to high-water mark. And in the case of Tomlin v. Dubuque, B. & M. R. Co., 82 Iowa, 109, the court held that "the doctrine deducible from adjudged cases is, that by the rules of the common law, the owner of land along the shore of a navigable river is entitled to no right, either in the shore or waters, as an incident of his ownership, except the contingent ones of alluvion and dereliction. Hence he is not entitled to damages for an improvement made along the banks of such river, by authority of the State, the effect of which is to deprive him of free access to the stream."

The same question was before the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., 6 N. Y. 522, and was decided the same way. In that case the court said: "The banks of the Hudson River between high and low water mark, belong to the people, and the riparian proprietor has no better right to the use of it than any other person. If he build on it or erect a wharf there, it would be a purpresture which the Legislature might direct to be removed or to be seized for the use of the public. Or the Legislature might authorize an erection in front thereof as in case of Smith's wharf on the Thames."

And in Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co., 84 N. J. L. 522, it was held that, although an owner of land adjacent to navigable water is more conveniently situated for the enjoyment of the public easements than others, he has, 12 L. R. A.

by virtue of common law, no more or greater rights than the rest of the community. In Langdon v. New York, 98 N. Y. 155, it was said that the Legislature of the State, where not restrained by constitutional inhibitions, could authorize a boom to be placed across the Hudson River for private use, and that the right of the State to grant the navigable waters except as restrained by constitutional checks, is as absolute as its rights to grant the dry land which it owns, and that the State holds the public domain as absolute owner and not as a trustee, except as it is organized and possesses all its powers and property for the public benefit.

Many decisions of the various state courts have been cited by appellee as sustaining a contrary doctrine to that of the above cases, but we find, upon examination, that they are mostly (especially those referring to riparian rights in tide-waters) based either upon statutes or local customs, and are therefore not precedents binding upon us.

Our attention is also called to the English cases of Buckleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418, and Lyon v. Fishmongers Co., 17 (Moak) Eng. Rep. 51, L. R. 1 App. Cas. 682, only the latter of which, however, we have had an opportunity to examine. And in that case the principal question involved was the construction of an Act of Parliament which distinctly recognized riparian rights in the owner, and which provided (§ 179) that "none of the powers by this Act conferred, or anything in this Act contained, shall extend to take away, alter or abridge any right, claim, privilege or franchise, exemption or immunity, to which any owner or occupier of any lands or hereditaments on the banks of the river, including the banks thereof, or of any aits or islands in the river, and by law entitled, nor to take away or abridge any legal right of ferry, but the same shall remain and continue in full force and effect as if this Act had never been made."

The Statute is a very broad and comprehensive one. And as it was not questioned but that Lyons' wharf was erected and used where it was in accordance with the law, the owner was therefore entitled to the "privilege" of continuing to use it, as against the Fishmongers' Company, as if the Act had never been passed.

Indeed, it was conceded in argument that he had a right of access from the river to the front of his wharf, but it was contended that he had no such right as to the side next Winckworth's Hole, which was merely an inlet from the river. The court held otherwise; and its conclusion was evidently in accordance with the provisions of the Act in question, although at variance with the earlier common-law doctrine as laid down by Lord Mansfield in King v. Smith, 2 Dougl. 441, in which that eminent jurist held that the king might authorize the erection of a structure in front of defendant's premises, between high and low water mark, in the River Thames, even though the defendant was thereby cut off from the use of his wharf.

The result of our investigation of the authorities leads us to the conclusion that riparian proprietors on the shore of the navigable waters of the State have no special or peculiar rights therein as an incident to their estate. To hold otherwise would be to deny the power of the State to deal with its own property as it may deem best for the public good.

If the State cannot exercise its constitutional right to erect wharves and other structures upon its public waters in aid of navigation without the consent of adjoining owners, it is obviously deficient in the powers of self-development which every government is supposed to possess—a proposition to which we cannot assent. See Galveston v. Menard, 23 Tex. 849.

Nor do we think this view in any way conflicts with the Constitution of the State, but, on the contrary, we believe it is in strict harmony with it, when all its parts are construed together. We cannot think that the building by the State or its grantees of wharves upon shores of navigable waters would constitute either a taking or damaging of private property for public use in contemplation of the Constitution.

The next question to be considered is, By what right, if any, do appellants occupy the shore in front of appellee's premises? And in considering this question, it must be remembered that the demurrer in this case admits that they have thereon valuable improvements in actual use for commerce, trade and business, and that said improvements were on said lands on March 26, 1890, the date of the passage of the Tide Land Act; that said lands are within one mile of the corporate limits of the City of Tacoma; that the harbor lines have not been fixed opposite to said lands, and that the same have not been disposed of by the State.

Appellee has never erected any improvements on the shore, but claims that the appellants are trespassers and that, as against them, he is entitled to relief by injunction. On the other hand, appellants claim to be rightfully in possession of the disputed lands by authority of the Act of the Legislature above mentioned.

Section 11 of this Act provides that "the owner or owners of any lands abutting, or fronting upon, or bounded by, the shore of the Pacific Ocean, or of any bay, harbor, sound, inlet, lake or watercourse shall have the right for sixty (60) days following the filing of the final appraisal of the tide lands to purchase all or any part of the tide lands in front of the lands so owned: provided, that if valuable improvements in actual use for commerce, trade or business have been made upon said tide lands by any person, association or corporation, the owner or owners of such improvements shall have the exclusive right to purchase the land so improved for the period aforesaid: . . . provided, that nothing in this Act shall be so construed as to apply to any improvements made after the passage of this Act."

We think, by a fair construction of this statute, that appellants are rightfully in possession of the disputed premises, and have a right to maintain their improvements as they were on March 26, 1890, but that they have no right to enlarge their erections, prior to such time as they may be authorized to purchase the lands from the State.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion. So ordered.

We concur: Hoyt, Scott and Dunbar, JJ.

Stiles, J., dissenting:

The plaintiff in the superior court, the appellee here, alleged ownership to lots 15, 16 and 17 in blocks 1 and 2 in Wallace's Addition to the City of Tacoma; that his lots had a water frontage on Puget Sound, a navigable arm of the sea, for a distance of more than 150 feet; that defendants had, about May 1, 1890, taken exclusive possession of the shore in front of his lots, including all the area between high and low water marks, and had placed certain obstructions in the way of his access to the water, and were threatening to increase the obstructions, and refused him any access to the water from his land, or to permit him to enjoy any of his riparian rights. The prayer of the complaint was for a mandatory injunction to secure the removal of the obstructions.

The answer admitted plaintiff's ownership to high-water mark, but denied his right of access and all other riparian rights; admitted taking possession of the shore; claimed improvements in actual use for commerce, trade and business on March 26, 1890, and prior thereto, and the right to purchase the land improved under the Act of that date; and alleged the distance between high and low water marks to be not exceeding 250 feet, and from high water to water of the depth of five fathoms to be 400 feet.

The court below sustained a demurrer to the answer and the opinion of this court has reversed the ruling.

I think the demurrer should have been sustained, first, for the reason that the allegations of the answer intended to show improvements March 26, 1890, was not the statement of any fact, but a conclusion of law; and, secondly, on the main question, because the law of the case is different from that announced by the court in its decision.

This is the first instance in the recorded history of English or American law where private persons, for private ends, have been sustained by a court in taking and maintaining permanent possession of the shore of an arm of the sea, or of any navigable water, to the exclusion of the owner of the bank from passing over it to the water; and if the Act of March 26, 1890, has the effect ascribed to it, it is the first Act of an English or American Legislature, not excepting those of New York and New Jersey, which has ever done so much.

The public right in navigable waters and to the soils underlying them has been freely regulated and disposed of by both Parliament and the Legislatures, but both have held sacred the rights admitted to exist in connection with the lands bordering the waters, whether with or without constitutional rules against taking private property without compensation. These rights have been regulated in divers ways proper to their locality, according to the complicated necessities of crowded harbors or the unfrequented shores of remote waters; but while it is true that a few courts have theoretically denied, many have actually upheld, them, and no other Legislature has ever ignored them.

Even the Act of the Legislature of New York, in 1840, which gave rise to the case of Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., 86 N. Y. 548, made the most ample provision for draw-bridges so as to continue navigation in bays and streams cut off by the railroad, and for the extension of wharves and docks across the tracks to the river beyond; all of which was in obedience to the settled policy of the State inaugurated in 1786, which prohibited the sale of any shore lands to other than riparian owners. Rumsey v. New York & N.E.R. Co. 114 N. Y. 423.

Of the other old States, every one, from the Massachusetts Colony in 1641, down to New Jersey in 1848 and 1869, has similar provisions to those of New York, and a similar policy.

Of the younger States, while some have no provisions by statute on the subject, every one which has a statute yields to the shore owner the right to wharf, and in the great majority of the others, the courts have held such a right to exist whenever the question has been presented. I know this argument proves nothing in the face of the claim that it is for every State to settle for itself, through its Legislature, what its policy in this regard will be. I adduce it merely by way of offering a reason why this court should be slow to conclude that the effect of the Act of 1890 was, and was intended to be, what it has now been decided to be.

We are not a new people. As an organized community we date from 1853. True the sovereignty was withheld until 1889; but upon the faith of a policy adopted and placed among the statutes of the Territory in 1854, lands were acquired upon the shores of our navigable waters, and improvements made at great cost by private persons; improvements which had a large share in making it possible for Washington to become a State, but which the principle of the court's decision would render it possible for the very next Legislature to sweep out of existence or confiscate without compensation.

This was a territorial statute, it is true; but the Territory was competent to frame, and did frame, policies in a hundred other particulars, between which and this I can see no distinction. If Massachusetts, in 1841, when a mere colony of Great Britain, could absolutely grant away the soil beneath the waters so as to bind her when she became a State, as well as the States of Maine and New Hampshire; and if the provincial governor of New York could, in 1689, grant to the City of New York the fee of the shore between high and low water marks, whereon are now based some of the most valuable titles in that city and in the world, it would seem to be no great violation of common sense to say that the Territory of Washington could lawfully legislate to the extent of the Act of 1854.

And who has ever questioned the title to shore lands under the Massachusetts ordinance, or under the Dongan Charter of 1689?

But it is said that the Constitution, or the Act of 1890, or both together, have repealed the Act of 1854. Let us see.

In the schedule of the Constitution, art. 27 § 2, in obedience to the last clause of section 24 of the Enabling Act, it was provided that all laws in force in the Territory, not repugnant to the Constitution, should remain in force until they expired by limitation or were repealed by the Legislature; and then there was a proviso: "That this section shall not be so construed as to validate any Act of the Legislature of Washington Territory granting shore or tide lands to any person, company or any municipal or private corporation." What effect does that proviso have on any such Act? It prevents the Constitution from "validating" it. If the Act was a valid law, it continued so; if it was invalid it continued the same. Everybody knows that the proviso was aimed at a single case where the Legislature of the Territory did once attempt to grant shore lands to a railroad company; and it was merely to prevent that Act from gathering force from the Constitution so as to render that valid which it was suspected had become or had always been invalid, that the proviso was enacted. The grant was believed to have been a fraud, and dead in law; and the proviso was to prevent its being galvanized into life.

But the Act of 1854 (Code, § 8271) was not a grant of lands, in any sense. This court has said it was "but a license at most," and while I do not agree that the right to wharf out was dependent upon the Act, the court's statement is good law to the effect that it was not a grant of tide or shore lands, and therefore was not covered by the proviso in question. But mark the difference when the Constitution touches shore lands covered by patents of the United States, taken and paid for in good faith by settlers. Article 17 treats of tide lands, and in its second section the State expressly disclaims all title to such patented lands unless the United States shall set aside the patents as fraudulent. Now, under the case of Pollard v. Hagan, these patents, so far as the tide lands were concerned, were absolutely void, and the lands would have belonged to the State, but for the constitutional waiver made by the people of the State, in their high sense of fairness and justice.

The only other provision on the subject in the Constitution is in section 1 of art. 17, where the State's ownership of the beds and shores of all the navigable waters in the State to ordinary high-water mark is asserted. But it did not require any such assertion to vest those lands in the State; for by an unbroken line of decision from far back of Pollard v. Hagan the courts have held that this ownership is in the State, thrust upon it as sovereign, in trust for its own people and those of the nation for purposes of commerce and navigation as natural highways. It is idle to say that this assertion in the Constitution conferred or strengthened the actual title of the State, and this could not, therefore, have been its purpose. But there was a valid purpose to subserve by the assertion, and that was to put it beyond question that in this State the sovereignty assumed was to high-water mark, and not merely to low-water mark. The United States, in all its grants has conceded that the fast land stops at high-water mark, but in some of the States, as Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Illinois and Minnesota, the title of the shore owner has been conceded to extend to low water or a certain distance below high-water mark. This concession was by legislation in some States, and by the decisions of courts in others. Meyers v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 266.

I hold that it was to place Washington in the rank of the greater number of States which stop the title of the shore owner at high water that the constitutional assertion of ownership was made, and for no other purpose, since no other purpose could be subserved by it.

But mark, again, the care with which this assertion of ownership was coupled with the proviso: "That this section shall not be construed so as to debar any person from asserting his claim to vested rights in the courts of the State."

Under the view the court takes of these constitutional provisions, what vested right could there be to which the proviso would apply? It could not have reference to any wharf property erected under the Act of 1854, since the court says that Act was a mere license; and a mere license is revocable at the pleasure of the licensor and creates no vested right. Kivett v. McKeithan, 90 N. C. 106; Johnson v. Skillman, 29 Minn. 95; St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards Co. v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 113 Ill. 384; Cobb v. Fisher, 121 Mass. 169.

So the court holds that the right to future accretions is not a vested right, citing Taylor v. Underhill, 40 Cal. 471, although that was merely the refusal of the court to declare a void certificate of purchase from the State a cloud upon plaintiff's right. This leaves nothing whatever for the constitutional provision to act upon, and the language, under the court's interpretation, is mere sound without any substance whatever.

The article (15) on harbors and tide-waters is nothing more than a limitation upon the Legislature, prohibiting it forever from disposing of the sea or river beds beyond certain lines in front of incorporated towns. Such lines exist in all important harbors and are drawn to preserve the public right of navigation. Usually their location is changed from time to time as circumstances require; and it was a change of this kind, fully authorized by the State, that produced the case of Yates v. Milwaukee.

The court seems to construe section 2 of this article as though there were never to be any wharves here except "upon certain designated areas," and that construction is quite harmonious with the views taken of the constitutional scheme as a whole; but, if anything else were necessary to convince one that the whole construction is wrong, this would supply it. Certainly no equally absurd scheme could be contrived unless someone were to propose that until the State build its wharves all ships must be anchored at the harbor line,—cargo and passengers to get ashore as best they can.

Turning now to the Act of March 26, 1890, the first thing that attracts attention, as having a bearing on the matter under discussion is that for some reason the law gives the pre-emptive right to buy tide lands, with certain exceptions, not to the public at large, but to the upland owner, and therein, I maintain, is foreshadowed the general policy of the State on this subject, which is to enlarge the right conceded to be in upland owners by the Act of 1854, and is exactly in harmony with the legislation of every other State in the Union which has lands of this character and laws upon the subject. I say this is the policy, because it is not going outside of proper bounds to further say that of all the shores of navigable waters within the State of Washington not one ten-thousandth part will be free from this pre-emptive right of shore owners, or their grantees under section 12 of the Act.

This section 12 has some striking language in it, which, to my mind, further shows the policy. Under it, when an abutting owner has attempted to convey tide lands in front of his uplands, or littoral rights therein, his grantee may purchase the tide lands to the extent of the tract or rights (littoral rights) so conveyed. Now what are the "littoral rights" which the upland owner could so convey? Are they what the Constitution speaks of as "vested" rights? The mere license under the Act of 1854 was not one of them, because a license is personal to the licensee and cannot be conveyed. 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 545.

What "littoral" right could an upland owner attempt to convey, but his right to wharf out, by way of severance? I confess inability to imagine any other; and if there is no other, and this one has no existence, then the Statute has nothing to act upon.

But suppose it were the wharf license that was meant; section 12 says nothing about an executed license as the one to be confirmed; and if this be the littoral right intended then the Legislature did not look upon the Act of 1854 as repealed by the Constitution. Furthermore, it is hard to see what good the State's deed to the shore owner's grantee will do for him, whether the littoral right be natural or statutory, if the harbor-line area is to be a wall between him and deep water. The State would be driving a hard bargain, indeed, with any such plan of operation, and is not to be suspected of such a scheme.

But the most important thing about this section 12 is the legislative admission contained in it, that the "land" and the "littoral right" are two so distinct and severable things that they may absolutely belong to different persons by deeds from the State. This is exactly what the doctrine of riparian access and wharfage is, and the justice of the provision made is apparent.

Lastly, touching the proviso of the 11th section: "That if valuable improvements, in actual use for commerce, trade or business have been made upon said tide lands by any person, association or corporation the owner or owners of such improvements shall have the exclusive right to purchase the land so improved, provided that nothing in this Act shall be so construed (as) to apply to any improvements made after the passage of this Act." Here, again, the care of the Legislature to preserve the right of the upland owner to acquire these lands is manifested most broadly, for subsequent to the passage of the Act no enlargement of the improvements can be made, and the court in its decision so holds. And it is also to be noted that whereas the upland owner may acquire all of the tide lands in front of his upland the improver has the pre-emptive right to nothing but the "land so improved;" so that in this case the appellants' purchase would be limited to the exterior line of their actual works on the 26th day of March, 1890, and the appellee could acquire all in front of them to the harbor line.

Now it was settled in Weber v. Board of Harbor Comrs. that a purchaser of tide lands from the State was entitled to none of the rights of a riparian owner. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 57, 21 L. ed. 798.

Upon what consideration, then, was this pre-emptive right conferred upon "improvers?" The Act itself furnishes the answer. By section 12, where the upland owner has, by his deed, for a consideration, conveyed his rights away, his grantees will be protected; yet there may be another class, who have merit equally as strong as the grantees under a deed. Where the owner of the fee of land has stood by for years, while an adverse claimant under color of title has made valuable improvements, the improvements offset the damages for withholding pro tanto (Code, § 541); and if the inaction of the owner continues beyond the term of our Statute of Limitations, the very title is presumed to have passed to the adverse party. An easement, however, of the nature of which the upland owners' rights both by nature and by statute largely partake, is much more easily lost. It is lost if the holder of the right does, or permits to be done, any Act inconsistent with the future enjoyment of the right. 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 147.

Therefore if an upland owner has, in any case, remained passive; while another has in good faith placed erections in the waters in front of him, which have not been abandoned, but are in customary use, the equitable policy of section 12 requires that an estoppel be sustained against the denial of the upland owner that he has conveyed to his permissive improver. The courts, which have often restrained intrusions of this kind, when objected to promptly, would have supported such an estoppel; why, then, should not the Legislature recognize it?

But I maintain that the Statute did not and could not deprive the upland owner of his full right to move promptly in the courts for the removal of any obstruction to his access to the water, where it was placed there against his will, and under threats of force 13 L. R. A.

and violence as the fact is admitted to be in this case; and that whenever such a state of facts exists any title derived from the State must be held in trust for the upland owner.

Such cases are precisely within the principles of Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 518, 24 L. ed. 732, and numerous other cases where force, fraud and the misconduct of officers have transferred lands patented by the United States to their rightful owners.

Emphasis is laid upon the construction by the last paragraph of the section, where it is provided that nothing in the Act shall apply to improvements made after the date of its passage; showing the legislative intention to discourage all scrambling possessions or claims not founded upon the upland owner's deed.

Conceding, however, that the Act was intended to apply to such a claim as the one at bar, it cannot be regarded in any other light than as showing the intention to make improvements alone the basis for the State's parting with its legal title, leaving the holders of adverse equities to resort to the courts for their enforcement. United States v. Schurz, 102 U. S. 378, 26 L. ed. 167.

And here the importance attached to a pleading of the facts in the answer appears. None of the material averments of the complaint were denied; for the allegations therein of the plaintiff's various rights were not material. If by nature the plaintiff had the rights claimed, it was not necessary to plead them; and the Statute gave him the exclusive right to purchase. The answer was a confession and avoidance in the nature of a plea in bar. But the rules of equity pleading require that a plea in bar shall state the facts upon which the avoidance is claimed, so that the plaintiff may demur to the sufficiency of the facts as constituting a defense. Goodrich v. Pendleton, 8 Johns. Ch. 385, 1 L. ed. 657; McCloskey v. Barr, 38 Fed. Rep. 165; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 175, 20 L. ed. 559; Farley v. Kittson, 120 U. S. 808, 30 L. ed. 684.

This answer alleged that valuable improvements in actual use for commerce, trade and business had been made upon said lands long prior to the 26th day of March, 1890, and that said improvements were on March 26, 1890, in actual use for commerce, trade and business, and that the defendants are the owners of and in possession of such improvements. These allegations are all but legal conclusions. Portman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 118; McCloskey v. Barr, supra.

The decision says the demurrer admits the truth of these allegations. But a demurrer admits the truth of such facts only as are well pleaded, and not of mere conclusions of law.

Of what could these improvements consist that would bring the defendants within the statutes? It is clear that there were no docks, piers, wharves or other conveniences of shipping, because it is declared, in the sixth paragraph, to be the intention of the defendants to erect and maintain such structures in the future; this court says they may not enlarge their present improvements; and their right to wharf out is precluded by the decision in Wabcr v. Board of Harbor Comrs., and by the fact that either the upland owner or someone else may buy the area in front of them to the harbor line.

I conclude, therefore, that there is nothing in the Constitution or the Statute which is hostile to the doctrine of riparian access and the right to wharf; that if it is denied tentatively by section 1, art. 17, the proviso leaves it to the courts to say whether, under the law, such rights exist; and that upon the pleadings the judgment should have been sustained.

The court has found that upon authority a riparian proprietor on the shore of the sea, or its arms, has no rights as against the State or its grantees to continued access to the water to extend wharves in front of his land below high-water mark. In the language of Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, p. 88, it has done so "by a narrow and technical course of reasoning, based upon the fact that the title to the soil is in the State or public," and has not, as I conceive, accepted the great weight of authority both in England and America. To my mind in reaching its conclusion it has completely ignored the prime common source of the State's title and of the riparian claim to access, which is that the navigable waters are natural public highways. Yet, as compared with this matter of substance all questions of reclamation, of accretion and selection, of fishery and seaweed, pale and fade into insignificance. It is as highways that the sovereignties of the world, and particularly our own, have any jurisdiction over the navigable waters differing in any respect from their jurisdiction over the fast land, and their different jurisdiction is of precisely the same character as the jurisdiction over highways upon the land.

Under the Constitution of the United States Congress has the power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign waters; but while under this power it has never yet undertaken to dictate concerning the manner of construction of any land highway not undertaken by itself, it has gone upon the water highways, both tide and fresh, and assumed the broadest control, deepening channels, changing harbors, building dikes and regulating the building of bridges, in all of which it has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, solely because the waters are natural highways. But it is at this point that the opponents of the riparian right of access make their strong stand, and where the forces of the parties for and against meet in final conflict; and that the court did not see fit to allude to this phase of the question is greatly to be regretted. For the real question involved here is not whether the owner of upland bordering upon the sea has any adverse claim to the soil under the water, as against the State; but whether, being upon his own fast land, he can step therefrom upon the public highway, there as a member of the public to enjoy the public right of passage.

In the case at bar the appellants, possessing themselves of the exact line which borders the land and the highway, say to the landowner: "You can reach the water by yonder street; or, if you will wait until we have built a wharf here you can pass over it at the same rate of toll as any other person. In the meantime you cannot pass at all." The appellants, however, in order to sustain their own position, are forced to maintain the very doctrine they fight against, that of the right of access. They oppose the upland owner's access, but having planted themselves in the highway, they propose to build wharves and maintain access themselves. By their improvements they propose to turn the shallows into land, and then will claim that access to the water is necessary to its enjoyment. But here is land formed by nature, that since time was had no other outlet than over the sea, put there by nature as a highway. The land passed from the sovereign owner by right of discovery, the United States, by solemn patent, to the appellee, who is now told that the highway he relied upon is forever closed without his consent and without any compensation for his loss. Has he been damaged? Actually, oh, yes! will be admitted by his bitterest opponent; but not in law, because the title to the land beneath this water is in the State. But wherein does the nature of the State's title to soil under navigable waters differ from that of its title to soil of a land highway? No writer or court that I have been able to consult points out the distinction, if there be one, except the subjection of the State's title in the submerged soil to the constitutional powers of Congress. If the purpose to be subserved by the State's holding the two titles is identical then, viz., the perpetuation of highways, it seems extremely difficult to argue on any secure or even plausible ground that the owner of land abutting on the sea has not the same right of access to, and continuance of, his highway, as his neighbor who abuts upon a land highway.

Certainly it is not necessary to argue what the rights of an abutter on a road or street are. The State, or its hand-maidens, the county, township, or municipal corporation, regulate and improve the way, but they cannot destroy it or injure the abutter's direct access to it from every part of his frontage, without compensation.

A late writer on this subject says: "Once a highway always a highway," is an old maxim of the common law to which we have often referred, and so far as concerns the rights of abutters, or others occupying a similar position, who have lawfully and in good faith invested or obtained property interests in the just expectation of the continued existence of the highway, the maxim still holds good. Not even the Legislature can take away such rights without compensation." Elliott, Roads and Streets, p. 658.

To illustrate this by more explicit authority: It has long been settled that running a street railroad is a proper public use of a street, when it is built so as not to interfere unnecessarily with the public right to travel over it; and that the mere erection of such a structure on the surface of the street does not entitle an abutting owner to compensation, even when the fee of the street is in him. But in some large cities it became necessary to have elevated railroads to carry on the traffic. These were authorized by the Legislature of New York with no provision for compensating abutters; and in a very recent case, where an elevated railroad had been built in front of his premises on Pearl Street an 'abutting owner' sued the railroad company for damages. Abendroth v. New York Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 25 N. E. Rep. 496.

The Court of Appeals in its decision said: "The term 'abutting owner' will be used in this judgment to denote a person having land bounded on the side by a public street, and having no title or estate in its bed or soil and no interests or private rights in the street except such as are incident to lots so situated. . . . There is no finding that the plaintiff, or any one of his predecessors ever had any title to or estate in the land whereon this street is maintained, or any interest except that of an abutting owner." The court then recalls numerous cases where abutting owners, both in city and country, in England and America, had been allowed special damages for obstructions in highways not opposite their land and not authorized by legislative enactment, as well as several late cases in that State where the same principle had been upheld where the obstruction was by legislative authority. Speaking of these last cases it says: "The judgments for damages which have been recovered and sustained against the elevated railroads do not, and cannot, rest on the ground that the roads are public nuisances, for they were constructed pursuant to statute; and besides, as before stated, a public nuisance does not create a private cause of action unless a private right exists and is specially injured by it. The only remaining ground upon which they can and do stand is that, by the common law, the plaintiffs had private rights in the streets before the roads were built or authorized to be built. . . . The Constitution of this State provides: 'Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.' It is settled by Story's Case, 90 N. Y. 123, and Lahr's Case, 104 N. Y. 268, 6 Cent. Rep. 371, that such rights as this plaintiff has in Pearl Street are private property within the meaning of the constitutional provision quoted. . . . It follows that the authority conferred by the Legislature to construct the road is not a defense to the action."

As will be seen, from the decision, so far as the public generally was concerned, no matter how great was the nuisance in the street, it could remain, because the Legislature authorized it.

And while I am so near the subject, I will here refer to the case of Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 124 U. S. 666, 81 L. ed. 543, relied upon by the court to sustain its decision. For the student of that case, it seems to me, must see that the only matter there in issue, and decided, was whether the State of New Jersey, as the superior of the City of Hoboken, could wholly destroy the public right of passage over filled-up lands at the end of a street, beyond the end of the street as originally dedicated. No private citizen was complaining, and the court says, on page 12 L. R. A.

698: "The right insisted upon in these actions by the City of Hoboken is the public right, and not the right of individual citizens claiming by virtue of conveyances of lots abutting on streets made by Stevens or his successors to the title. The public right represented by the plaintiff is subordinate to the State, and subject to its control. The State may release the obligation to the public, may discharge the land of the burden of the easement, and extinguish the public right to its enjoyment. Whatever it may do in that behalf conclusively binds the local authorities, when, as in the present cases, the rights of action asserted are based exclusively on the public right." And it might have added that the Legislature of New Jersey could have altogether destroyed the corporation of Hoboken; but it could not touch the right of a single lotowner, corporation or no corporation, to pass from his lot to the street, and thence abroad.

The difficulty which the court finds in harmonizing Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, and the other leading cases in the United States Supreme Court, with Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. vanishes entirely when the right of the State to incumber a public highway, or to destroy it altogether, so far as the public right is concerned, is studied in connection with a case like that of Abendroth and the other New York Elevated Railroad cases, and the same principles are applied to both as should be done.

And now, the right to wharf is derived by strict analogy from the abutter's right in connection with a land highway. For no one questions the right of an abutter, where the improved roadway covers but a narrow strip in the middle of the way, to build for himself a convenient means to reach the traveled track, over the intervening land; and so on the waterway, the navigable part of the water is the actual way, to which the wharf is the reasonable means of access. And as the right of access to the road pertains to every portion of the abutter's front, so the right to wharf belongs to all of the riparian owners' fronts. I know it is said, in response to this, that the abutter cannot charge a toll to any member of the public who goes upon his side-way. Granted. But there is no question here of charging wharfage, which must be always reasonable, and is always under the public control. Parkersburgh & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburgh, 107 U. S. 699, 37 L. ed. 587.

It was strongly intimated in Yates v. Milwaukee that whenever the water-way was made navigable up to the line of the upland owner's land, he could then no longer maintain his right to project his wharf. But except in very contracted waters, the cheaper and more practical way is to build out the wharves, instead of deepening the water.

The deprivation of these private rights by the State for its own public purposes is the taking of property, whether on land or water, and must be compensated.

Why, at this day, are these rights denied? I think this is the reason. Sometimes it happens that it is not necessary, for purposes of navigation, that the water-way should be as wide as nature has made it.

Moreover, the waters have washed down the banks and made shoals and flats, which can be filled up and made fast land, valuable for building and even farming purposes. The self interest of upland owners has led them, in some instances, backed by their lawful riparian rights, to claim substantially the whole beneficial use of the entire area from the high-water mark to the point of navigability, by which means, and the non-assertion of the State's rights, they have filled up the flats, excluded the water and made land of the whole. In some States, as Rhode Island and Minnesota, this has been conceded to them as a right, and the public has received nothing for its complaisance. This is not justice. The protest against such a monopoly has, as is often the case in such matters, overflowed its proper bounds and gone to the extent of denying all riparian rights. But there is a middle course which is the right one, in my judgment, and which the courts ought to pursue as leading to the law of these cases. I regret that the decision here adopted follows one of the extremes and not the middle course.

I now come to consider the cases cited by the court as requiring its conclusion.

Theoretically that is not land which is beneath navigable water; from the high-water mark all beyond is water. Grants of land stop at the margin, no matter how shallow or extensive may be the shoals beyond. Yet, although we do not endure the State as an ordinary landlord, we say that the title to the sea and river bottoms is in it. The State holds upland upon the same terms and with the same rights as a private citizen. We enforce this rule even upon the federal government, in all but the matter of taxation and the right of eminent domain.

There was a time when it was thought that the land beneath navigable waters belonged to the United States; but the Supreme Court in Pollard v. Hagan awarded it to the several States. Yet, in that great case, 44 U. S. 8 How. 229, 11 L. ed. 578, the court said that Alabama held these submerged lands as a part of her sovereignty and jurisdiction, not governed by the common law of England as it prevailed in the Colonies before the Revolution, but as modified by our own institutions, and that "although the territorial limits of Alabama have extended her sovereign power into the sea, it is there, as on the shore, but municipal power subject to the Constitution of the United States, and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof." And it is worthy of note that the eminent counsel who successfully presented that case for the defendant said: "A right to the shore between high and low water mark is a sovereign right, not a proprietary one. Rivers do not pass by grant, but are an attribute of sovereignty. The right passes in a peculiar manner; it is held in trust for every individual proprietor in a State or the United States, and requires a trustee of great dignity. Rivers must be kept open; they are not land which may be sold. Martin v. Waddell."

v. Hagan in some way involved the question of riparian rights. On the contrary, it was a contest between a patentee of tide flats from the United States, who was not an upland owner, and a squatter on the tide flats who had no license whatever from the State of Alabama.

The same repute is true of Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. ed. 997. But the case was this: The titles to nearly or quite all the land in New Jersey came from the grantees of the Duke of York, to whom Charles Second, in 1664, in consideration of the annual payment of forty beaver skins, gave a charter bestowing upon his royal brother the sovereignty and proprietorship of all the lands, bays, waters, rivers, soils, fisheries, etc., etc., within a vast area. The duke immediately parceled out his domain, under grants equally generous in their terms with that of the king to himself, and under one of these the proprietors of East Jersey became vested with all his rights in the lands and waters about Raritan Bay. In 1702 the proprietors surrendered to Queen Anne the sovereignty only; and by the Revolution New Jersey became an independent State. The royal grants, however, were respected, and New Jersey had no public lands. The proprietors continued to make grants of lands to colonists and in a few instances attempted to convey exclusive rights of fishing to individuals in certain defined areas of Raritan Bay. In 1821, one Arnold, the possessor of such a fishery, sued one Mundy for trespass in entering the limits of his fishery and taking away oysters. The case was appealed on a judgment for defendant, and is reported in Halsted, 1. The ground of the decision was that although the king of England could by his royal charter grant to a subject an indisputable title to any or all of the fast land, he could not and did not grant one inch of the soil beneath the waters to the Duke of York, because it belonged to the sovereignty which was held in trust for the common public, and was returned to Queen Anne, to be devolved in turn upon the State of New Jersey. After stating some of the dispositions which the State might make of these soils, the court said: "The sovereign power itself therefore, cannot, consistently with the principles of the laws of nature and the Constitution of a well-ordered society, make a direct and absolute grant of the waters of the State, divesting all the citizens of their common right (of fishery). It would be a grievance which never could be long borne by a free people."

In 1824 a statute of New Jersey gave to riparian owners the right to drive stakes in the waters of the bay, in front of their lands, to which to fasten nets, they not interfering with the navigation or any fishery. Waddell drove stakes accordingly, within the lines of a several fishery theretofore granted by the proprietors, and Martin, the grantee of the fishery, brought ejectment. The cause resulted as did Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. L. 1, and reached the Supreme Court of the United States in 1842, where it was affirmed. The question here was, as in all cases of ejectment, upon the strength of plaintiffs' title, and had no bearing whatever upon any riparian rights of the defendant; nor did the fact that the defendant had a license from the State cut any figure in the decision, and the result would have been the same without it. The court said: "From the opinion expressed in Blundell v. Catterall, 5 Barn. & Ad. 287, and in Somerst v. Fogwell, 5 Barn. & C. 888, the question whether since Magna Charta the king could grant to a subject a portion of the soil covered by the navigable waters of the kingdom so as to give him an immediate and exclusive right of fishery, either of shell fish or floating fish, within the limits of his grant must be regarded as settled in England against the right of the king."

The case of Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412, decided in 1829, merely held that in the absence of congressional legislation, the State of Delaware could authorize the damming of an inconsiderable sluggish creek for the purpose of facilitating the owners of its marshy shores in reclaiming them; so that the health of the community could be bettered; and that a citizen of another State could not complain of the obstruction.

McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 891, 24 L. ed. 248 (1876), decided that a State held the tide-waters and the fish in them for its own people, and not for the people of another State; and that a statute prohibiting the citizens of any other State from taking the fish was, "in effect, nothing more than the regulation of the use, by the people, of their common property," and therefore no denial of the constitutional right that the citizens of each State have to all the immunities and privileges of citizens of the several States.

Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 824, 24 L. ed. 224, confirmed the claim of the State of Iowa to the title of the Mississippi to high-water mark; but as the main point in the case held that one who has dedicated a street parallel to navigable water cuts himself off from riparian ownership, and yields to the public, in this instance the City of Keokuk, the right to wharf out as an incident of the public use of the street. Barney's contention was that as owner of the land to the middle of the river, his dedication only extended to the water's edge, and that the filling beyond that line was a trespass on his land.

It will be seen from the opinion of the court that its decision is based mainly upon these United States Supreme Court cases. It is worthy of remark that they have not been so interpreted in any but a very small minority of the States: and the Supreme Court itself has never in a single instance based its ruling, in a case where the riparian right of wharfage was in issue, upon any state statute or ascertained custom or usage. In its most clearly cut decision, Yates v. Milwaukee, no such interpretation was allowed to interfere with its declaration of a riparian right of wharfage in Yates, although he was contending not only against the City of Milwaukee but against the State of Wisconsin, which had chartered the city to regulate the wharves on her water front and herself to build and maintain such aids to navigation at the ends of the streets.

In Weber v. Board of Harbor Comrs., 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 57, 21 L. ed. 798, notwithstanding the language quoted by the court in its opinion, Judge Field distinctly and broadly announced the adherence of the Supreme Court to the doctrine of Yates v. Milwaukee, and showed that Weber was not a riparian owner. It is worth remembering at this point that San Francisco was the successor of a Mexican pueblo, and that the municipal corporation was the owner of all the land to high-water mark, so that when the State of California fixed the harbor line and surrendered the tide lands within it to the city, it was making the surrender to a riparian owner. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530.

Inasmuch as the cases above noted are chiefly relied upon to overcome the force of Dutton v. Strong, Yates v. Milwaukee and St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, and as none of them involved the matter here in issue, I will briefly allude to these three cases, which it is agreed do touch the point. It is urged that there was a difference between the fresh-water rules and the salt-water rules; or that the upland owner had already built his wharf, presumably under state license; or that there was some unmentioned statute on which the court was relying, et cetera. But if any such elements did enter into the consideration of those cases, the published decisions, from syllabus to signatures, including briefs of counsel, fail to note the fact. Their declarations are broad and general, and if we may rely on anything in judicial decisions, we ought to be able to do so here. Each of the cases was quoted in the succeeding ones, and all have been cited often and again by the supreme court, and by almost every federal and state court. Yates v. Milwaukee is the leader, and that was a case in which the state's authority was indirectly, but very materially, in question. So in St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, the defendant had the State's title to the land over which the plaintiff claimed to exercise his right of access.

Since those decisions, there is, I believe, not a single case in the federal or state reports where the principles therein laid down are doubted or departed from. On the contrary, they have been often cited, always to the effect contended for here, and to the frequent overruling of contrary holdings. It is the same with the law-writers who have embraced this subject in their works, with a single exception. I mention this, not as arguing that numbers make the law, but to show that the profession has not understood those decisions to have been pronounced with any of the qualifications and reservations suggested; and I conclude with the proposition, taken from these cases and never denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, that a riparian owner on the sea-shore has a natural right of access and a right to construct a landing, wharf or pier, for his own use or for the use of the public, which is a vested right, incident or appurtenant to his land, under the common law of real property as it exists in the United States, without any reference to statutory license or customary usage. In support of this position I cite, Angell, Tide Waters, 24, 224 et seq.; Cooley, Const. Lim, 5th ed. p. 675, note 1; Angell, Watercourses, 7th ed. 782; 8 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 445; Gould, Waters, §§ 148-154; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 77-83; Dillon, Mun. Mr. Wood, in his Law of Nuisances, is, I believe, the only modern text-book writer who maintains the opposite ground. But this author does not attempt to misconstrue Yates v. Milwaukee, or find excuses for its ruling. On the contrary he attacks it boldly, characterizing the language of it as "mere dictum," and declares the principle established by it "as wholly unsustained by any authority." We are not accustomed to thus lightly treat decisions of that great court; but the attack thus made is admirable for its audacity. Lyon v. Fishmongers Co. is also explained away by this court as never before. Mr. Wood found no explanation. He quotes at length from the opinions of Lords Cairnes, Chelmsford and Shelburne, and then says: "Thus it will be seen that there is considerable conflict upon the question discussed in the note, but while we believe that the doctrines advanced in this case are utterly fallacious and unsustained in principle, as they are upon authority, it will not be profitable to pursue the matter further; but as it is the business of an author to give the law as he finds it, I have felt constrained to give the leading portions of the opinions of the Lords Justices in the case, that the question may be fairly presented."

I take it that the author "gives the law as he finds it," when he quotes the opinion of the two highest courts of the civilized world, although he personally does not agree with the correctness of their decision.

The court assumes that inasmuch as many of the States have long had statutes regulating the riparian owner's exercise of his right of wharfage, and in many instances enlarging it, therefore his right rests entirely upon the statute of his State. I do not see why it should be so regarded, since we constantly find what has always been the law enacted into statutory form; and we might as consistently say that the State's title to the tide and shore lands is dependent solely upon article 17 of the Constitution. It is sufficient to say that the courts of the States alluded to have not taken any such position, and I shall now cite some cases showing this to be the fact.

One of the oldest of these statutes is that of Maryland, in 1745; but in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Chase, 48 Md. 28, the court said: "These riparian rights (of accretion and wharfage), founded on the common law, are property and are valuable, and while they must be enjoyed in due subjection to the rights of the public, they cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously destroyed or impaired. They are rights of which, once vested, the owner can only be deprived in accordance with the law of the land, and, if necessary that they be taken for public use, upon due compensation,"—citing Yates v. Milwaukee. In New York, although for many years the courts have been handicapped by Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., 6 N. Y. 548, as a settled rule of property, in New York v. Hart, 95 N. Y. 448, the court said: "But it shocks every notion of justice and right to say that the riparian owner upon a navigable water has no equities by reason of that ownership. It is a doctrine which is repudiated by the entire legislation of our State. Granting, as has been held, that the riparian owner has no legal or equitable right enforceable as such against the public right, it is nevertheless true that out of his situation upon the banks, and the convenience and benefit of the water front, he suffers peculiar damage and individual injury when cut off by public use. . . . And whenever and wherever the State has granted to the City of New York exterior lands under water, it has accompanied the grant with pre-emptive rights to the adjacent owners. It is idle to say that all this has been done of pure grace, and without any equity in the abutters. There was reason for doing it, and justice in the act." If stronger language were needed to show that the New York Court of Appeals would now overturn Gould v. Hudson River R. Co. if it could, it is to be found in Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 114 N. Y. 428, 125 N. Y. 681.

Rhode Island has always maintained the doctrine contended for, without reference to any statute [Providence S. E. Co. v. Providence S. Co. 13 R. I. 348; Clark v. Peckham, 10 R. I. 85]; Connecticut, in like manner. Simons v. French, 25 Conn. 345; State v. Sargent, 45 Conn. 858.

This case contains an eminently fair discussion of the powers of the State.

In New Jersey the courts maintained the rule, until Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co., 84 N. J. L. 532 [see Keyport & M. P. S. B. Co. v. Farmers Transp. Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 516; Gough v. Bell, 23 N. J. L. 411; Bell v. Gough, 28 N. J. L. 624], when in a long discussion not in any wise necessary to the decision of the case the court announced that riparian owners had no rights which could be injured by the State, but, at the same time, sustained a judgment for injuries of precisely the character discussed, in all essential parts. The decision on the main point for which the case is celebrated was based on the English case of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 Exch. 281, which was reversed afterwards in the House of Lords [L. R. 5 H. L. 418], and still further overthrown by Lyon v. Fishmongers Co., 17 (Moak.) Eng. Rep. 51, on the very point relied on. The Legislature of New Jersey immediately amended the wrong done by this decision, by its Act of 1869.

Vincum Fishing Co. v. Carter, 61 Pa. 31, says: "The State can grant authority to make such erections (of structures below high water) either to the riparian owner, or to others, so long as the riparian owner is not thereby deprived of access to and the use of the river as a public highway, which is implied, if not expressed, in the grant to him of land bounded on the stream."

In North Carolina, Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 189, is the latest of several cases on this subject, and there the court said: "In the absence of any special legislation on the subject, a littoral proprietor and a riparian owner, as is universally conceded, have a qualified property in the water frontage, belonging by nature to their land; the chief advantage growing out of the appurtenant estate in the submerged land being the right of access over an extension of their water fronts to navigable water, and the right to construct wharves, piers or landings subject to such general rules and regulations as the Legislature, in the exercise of its powers, may prescribe for the protection of the public rights in rivers or navigable water."

It will be said that the phrase "in the absence of any special legislation on the subject" means unless there be special legislation otherwise;" but it is not so. The sense is "without any legislation to that effect," and the decision shows it.

Bond v. Wool is supported by decisions in other States, old and new, in numerous cases of which I mention one or more in each, viz.: in Michigan,—Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125; Lincoln v. Davis, 58 Mich. 375; in Indiana,—Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 29 Ind. 364; in Wisconsin,—Deleplains v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Wis. 214; in Minnesota,—Brisbane v. St. Paul & S. O. R. Co. 23 Minn. 114; in Missouri,—Meyers v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 266, affirmed, 82 Mo. 367; in Illinois,—Chicago & St. P. R. Co. v. Stein, 75 Ill. 41; in Kentucky,—Thurman v. Morrison, 14 B. Mon. 367; in Ohio,—Hickok v. Hine, 23 Ohio St. 523; in Arkansas,—Organ v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 51 Ark. 235, and cases cited; in California,—Shirley v. Bishop, 67 Cal. 543; in Oregon,—Wilson v. Welch, 12 Or. 353; Parker v. West Coast Packing Co. 17 Or. 510, 5 L. R. A. 61.

Of these States, at least Missouri, Kentucky, Arkansas, North Carolina, California and Oregon stop the upland title at high-water mark.

Cases to the same undoubted effect in the United States courts are: Bowman v. Wathen, 2 McLean, 376; Northwestern Union Packet Co. v. Ailes, 2 Dill. 479, affirmed, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 389, 23 L. ed. 619; Illinois v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 730; Hollingsworth v. Parish of Tensas, 17 Fed. Rep. 118; Ruts v. St. Louis, 3 McCrary, 261; Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 699, 27 L. ed. 587; Potomac S. B. Co. v. Upper Potomac S. B. Co. 109 U. S. 673, 27 L. ed. 1070.

In Van Dolsen v. New York, 17 Fed. Rep. 317, decided in 1883, the facts were precisely those of the case at bar, and after considering all of the cases, both English, state and federal, the court holds that the New York Elevated Railroad Cases are decisive of the law; that State, since there is no difference between the principles applying to the land-way and the water-way; and further, that in view of Yates v. Milwaukee, Lyon v. Fishmongers Co. and other like cases, Gould v. Hudson River R. Co., Stevens v. Paterson & N. R. Co., Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. 9, and Furman v. New York, 10 N. Y. 565, are no longer to be regarded as controlling. 12 L. R. A.

There the lessee of the riparian owner sought an injunction to prevent the City of New York, which was the owner of the land between high and low water, from filling up the flat and obstructing his access to the way, and was held to be entitled to the relief asked.

This court, I think, misreads the case of Lyon v. Fishmongers Co., where it gives importance to the term "privilege" as though the right sustained in Lyon were a concession of statute or usage merely. On the contrary, each of the lords who delivered an opinion was pronouncedly clear that the right was by nature. Said Lord Shelburne: "The rights of a riparian proprietor, so far as they relate to any natural stream, exist jure natura, because his land has, by nature, the advantage of being washed by the stream; and if the facts of nature constitute the foundation of the right, I am unable to see why the law should not recognize and follow the course of nature in every part of the same stream. . . . Even if it could be shown that the riparian rights of the proprietor of land on the bank of a tidal navigable river are not similar to those of a proprietor above the flow of the tide, I should be of the opinion that he had a right to the river frontage belonging by nature to his land, although the only practical advantage of it might consist in the access thereby afforded him to the water, the right of navigation common to him with the rest of the public. Such a right of access is his only, and is his by virtue and in respect of his riparian property; it is wholly distinct from the public right of navigation."

No other state court has interpreted this case, and the opinions of the judges to mean anything but what they say; and a very high English authority, the Encyclopedia Britannica, cites the case in the concluding words of its article on Riparian Laws in this way: "It should be noticed that rights of the public may be subject to private rights. Where the river is navigable, although the right of navigation is common to the subject of the realm, it may be connected with a right to exclusive access to riparian land, the invasion of which may form the ground for legal proceedings by the riparian proprietor."

Says Judge Dillon in his Municipal Corporations, § 106: "By the common law the riparian owner has the right to establish a wharf on his own soil, this being a lawful use of the land. The right is judicially recognized in this country, and riparian owners on ocean, lake or navigable rivers have, in virtue of their proprietorship and without special legislative authority, the right to erect wharves, quays, piers and landing places on the shore if these conform to the regulations of the State for the protection of the public, and do not become a nuisance by obstructing the paramount right of navigation. This right has been exercised by the owners of the adjacent land from the first settlement of the country."

The idea of "purpresture" furnishes forth a great difficulty in the mind of the court. There is a short and comprehensive history of that pretentious institution in People v.

Davidson, 80 Cal. 879, from which it appears to be not much more than an ancient prerogative ghost, whose original substance has been completely emasculated by the later law. Suffice it to say, that whether the doctrine of purpresture as applied to wharves extended by riparian owners has any force in this country or not, it never, in its palmy days, had the effect of permitting the king to shut off the riparian owner of land from access to the sea by an obstruction of any kind placed in the highway, which is the real ultimate point in issue in this case.

In conclusion I recur to the Act of 1854, to remark that if that Act is to be taken as now repealed, and if riparian owners have not the natural right of access and wharfage, then there is not, in the State of Washington, any authority under which the slightest convenience can be erected or maintained in aid of navigation, excepting in front of incorporated towns; and all the accumulations of labor and wealth already expended by private enterprise in building up a commerce second to none in present importance and future promise, are laid at the mercy of a public policy which has not seen its equal since men began to "go down in ships." For what? To maintain an idea of "legal title" and royal sovereignty, which has been repudiated for generations, and which now at this day says to the common people of Washington: "The shores of your great inland sea, and of your hundred rivers, are walled in by the State until such time as after survey, appraisement, contests, slow legislative proceedings, and what not, the speculator on your necessities shall have loaded himself with tide-land patents, and fattened with your fees for crossing his "land." The simple logger may not roll the hard-won product of his toil down the slope of his land and into the water because some shrewd watcher of the land office has bought the shore while his back was turned. This is making the waters a public highway with a vengeance. But the illustration is just, because it refers to the very use made every day of our shores in hundreds of places without wharves, docks or piers, and where there is no question of purpresture, but only the right of access is availed of. It involves the principle of the case in homely, practical form.

Conceiving that no such conclusions were necessarily involved in the Constitution or the Statute, I dissent from the idea that any such policy was intended to be adopted, even though it were lawful to do so.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Egbert JAMIESON, Appt.,
v.
INDIANA NATURAL GAS & OIL CO.

(....Ind.....)

1. Courts take judicial notice of the fact that natural gas is a dangerous agency.
2. The regulation of the pressure of natural gas transported in pipes is within the police power of the Legislature to be exercised according to its discretion in the absence of facts showing oppression or usurpation under a pretext of exercising police power, at least so far as constitutional provisions protecting vested or contract rights are concerned.
3. A contract is invalidated by the subsequent enactment of police regulations which render its performance illegal as to one of the parties.
4. Judicial notice will be taken of the relative distances from a certain place to another part of the same State and to neighboring States.
5. State regulation of the pressure of natural gas transported in pipes within the State which operates upon all alike is not necessarily an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Porter County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin the performance of a contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter D. Holt for appellant.

Messrs. Bell, Morris, Morris & Barrett and Elam & Winter for appellees.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint of the appellant states these material facts: The Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company is a corporation organized under the laws of Indiana, for the purpose of drilling wells, procuring natural gas and supplying it to consumers. The appellant is a stockholder in that corporation. The Columbus Construction Company is also a corporation and is the owner of natural-gas wells in many counties of this State. In June, 1890, the Gas Company entered into a contract with the Construction Company, wherein it was provided that the latter company should acquire the right of way through Indiana and through Illinois to the City of Chicago; that it should construct for the Gas Company on the right of way secured a line of pipe for the transportation of natural gas, and should furnish all necessary machinery and appliances required to obtain and convey natural gas to consumers. In consideration of the purchase of the right of way and the furnishing and construction of pipe lines, machinery and appliances, the Gas Company agreed to issue and deliver to the Construction Company capital stock to the value of $1,500,000; and also to issue to the Construction Company $4,000,000 of its corporate bonds, and to secure their payment by a mortgage upon its property and franchises. The Construction Company, proceeding under the contract, acquired a right of way as agreed, and did purchase and lay down a line of pipe for a distance of twenty miles, and distributed pipe along the right of way for a distance of forty miles. That Company has purchased, and has in readiness, machinery and appliances to be connected with the line of pipes; and it is able, ready and willing to perform its part of the contract. Natural gas can only be transported to Chicago by pumping and under pressure. It will be impossible to transport it to that point at a pressure which does not exceed 825 pounds to the square inch. The Gas Company will have no other assets or property than "its plant and system, and no means whatever of paying either the principal or interest of the corporate bonds," which are to be issued to the Construction Company; but its only means of paying such bonds or of redeeming its capital stock will be such as are derived from "the plant and system and the revenues, tolls, income and profits to be earned thereby in the transportation and sale of natural gas in the City of Chicago; and the sole value of its stock will depend upon the right and ability of said Company to engage in and carry on, by means of its natural-gas plant and system, the business of transporting natural gas to Chicago and there selling the same." The plant and system cannot be put to any other commercially profitable use than that of transporting natural gas to Chicago, and can only be used to advantage and profit by the use as aforesaid of the pumping machines and other artificial devices. The complaint sets forth at full length the Act of March 4, 1891; and, in addition to the averments of the facts already outlined, contains these allegations: "The Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company, by reason of the Statute aforesaid, is prohibited from transporting said gas through said pipe line at more than the natural flow and pressure, or at a pressure in excess of 800 pounds to the square inch; or from using any artificial device to increase or maintain the natural flow of the gas. The natural gas property and plant constructed to be furnished and delivered to the defendant as aforesaid will be of no value for the purpose of such plant and of little or no value for any purpose to said defendant; and the stock and bonds of the defendant will be wasted and said Company deprived of all the means of effecting the objects and purposes of its incorporation and be rendered entirely insolvent."

Plaintiff further avers and charges that the statute aforesaid has made it unlawful for said defendant, or any person in said State of Indiana, to transport natural gas through said pipe line at a pressure exceeding 800 pounds per square inch, or the natural flow and pressure of such gas, or to use in such transportation any artificial device for the purpose, or which shall have the effect of increasing or maintaining the natural flow and pressure of such gas.

Wherefore plaintiff avers that it has become and is illegal for either of said defendant Companies to further proceed with the execution of said contract, and that the defendant, the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company especially ought not to be permitted to further proceed in the execution of said contract, the performance of which will result as aforesaid, in a waste and destruction of almost its entire corporate assets and make it entirely impracticable for it to carry out the objects and purposes of its incorporation, and will also involve it in liability for the payment of heavy penalties for the violation of said Statute.

Plaintiff avers that immediately upon the taking effect of said Statute, he demanded of the board of directors of said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company that they and the said Company should at once desist from any further proceedings toward executing and carrying out said contract; and that they should abandon the said enterprise of transporting natural gas by the use of artificial pressure, or pressure in excess of 800 pounds to the square inch, or other than the natural flow and pressure of said natural gas; and that they should at once rescind and abandon the said contract; but that said board of directors refused to do so, and declared that, notwithstanding said Statute and regardless of the right of this plaintiff, they would proceed to perform fully said contract as to all the obligations of the said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company thereunder; and would not abandon the said enterprise of transporting natural gas by artificial pressure in excess of the natural flow and pressure and in excess of 800 pounds to the square inch; and that upon performance of said Columbus Construction Company of its part of said contract, the said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company would issue and deliver to said Columbus Construction Company its stock and bonds in all respects according to the terms of said contract.

Plaintiff further avers that in execution of said contract companies have already and since the taking effect of said Statute, connected their said pipe line with certain gas wells in the County of Howard, in the State of Indiana, being wells which, under said contract, are to be acquired and used by the said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company, and by means of a certain artificial device for pumping, known as a pump, being a part of the machinery to be acquired and used by said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company, did unlawfully transport the natural gas from said wells, through the said line of pipe in said county, at an artificial pressure in excess of 800 pounds to the square inch, and in excess of the natural pressure and flow of said gas, to wit, at a pressure of 490 pounds to the square inch; whereas, the natural pressure of such gas was but to wit, 325 pounds to the square inch, and ever since have continued to and still are so engaged in violating the provisions of said Statute; whereby the said the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company has already incurred liability for the penalty prescribed by said Statute and will be subjected to further liability for such penalties unless the said defendant companies be enjoined as hereinafter prayed; which will result in further waste of the corporate assets and irreparable loss to this plaintiff.

And plaintiff further avers that said defendant, the Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Company, unless enjoined from so doing, will issue to said Columbus Construction Company its bonds and stock as provided by said contract.

The trial court carried back the demurrer addressed to an answer filed by the appellees to the complaint, and gave judgment because of the insufficiency of that pleading. The ruling of the trial court in carrying back and sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's complaint is properly challenged by a specification in the assignment of errors.

We decide the case upon the ruling adjudging the complaint bad; and we neither give nor intimate an opinion upon any other ruling, nor upon any other questions than such as that ruling legitimately presents. We do not feel at liberty to consider any other questions than those designated, and upon none others do we give judgment, nor, indeed, can we decide any other questions without a departure from settled principles of procedure.

To determine what questions are legitimately presented to us it is necessary to give a construction to the complaint which the trial court condemned; but it is only necessary to state in a very general way what we adjudge to be the nature of the complaint. We adjudge that the complaint is to be construed as charging that the contract of the corporation of which the appellant is a member with the Construction Company is incapable of performance because it requires a violation of the Act of March 4, 1891, in this: that it provides for and requires that natural gas be transported in pipes at a greater pressure than the natural pressure, or at an artificial pressure exceeding 800 pounds to the square inch. We may further affirm it to be our judgment upon this phase of the case that there is here no question as to the right of a stockholder to maintain such a suit as this, for no such question is presented by the briefs or arguments; and we say, still further, that the essential and controlling question presented by the ruling upon the complaint is whether a contract which can not possibly be performed without a direct violation of a statute is invalidated by the enactment. The complaint avers, and the demurrer admits, that the performance of the contract is impossible without violating the statutory provision that no greater pressure than 800 pounds to the square inch shall be put upon pipes used for the transportation of natural gas. We are careful to state the questions upon which we give judgment, and to declare the construction which we give to the complaint upon which those questions arise, so that there may be no misconception of our decision.

It is obvious from what we have said that the central question here presented and here to be decided is this: Is the provision of the Act of March 4, 1891, prohibiting the use of more than the natural pressure or an artificial pressure exceeding 800 pounds to the square inch, invalid because it violates the Constitution of the United States or of the State of Indiana? The validity of that provision, and of that provision alone, demands our judgment. If the Legislature of Indiana has no power to require that the pressure put upon natural gas poured into pipes shall not exceed three hundred pounds where artificial pressure is employed, the contract between the two corporations is legal and the complaint is bad; if it has such power, the complaint is good.

The question, as the record presents it, is one of power. With questions of policy or expediency the courts have no concern. Licenses Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 463, 18 L. ed. 497; Heiderich v. State, 101 Ind. 564.

If a subject is within the legislative power, the question whether that power is wisely or unwisely exercised is not a judicial one. If the power exists, then the Legislature must determine the mode of its exercise, unless the mode is prescribed by the organic law. If, to descend from a wide generalization to a narrow one, a subject is within the police power of the State, the question as to what regulations are proper and needful is one for legislative consideration and decision. It is a cardinal principle of law that legislative discretion cannot be controlled by judicial decisions, and is not subject to judicial surveillance. Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457-561, 20 L. ed. 287-315; State v. Haworth, 123 Ind. 463-467, 7 L. R. A. 240.

It must be true, therefore, that if the Legislature of Indiana has power to regulate the pressure that shall be put upon natural gas taken from wells in this State and conducted into pipes laid in the soil of the State, it has, presumptively at least, power to determine what limit the public safety requires to be placed upon the pressure employed. The question as it comes to us is not a broad one, involving the authority of the Legislature arbitrarily to enact a law destructive of property by commercial rights under the guise of exercising police power; for here there is regulation and not destruction. If artificial pressure is resorted to it must, as the Statute declares, not exceed 800 pounds to the square inch, and there is nothing in the complaint justifying the inference that this is an unreasonable regulation, or one made to accomplish an unlawful object. There are no facts presented warranting the inference that such a pressure is not reasonable, or is not demanded for the public safety.

As the regulation prescribed by the Statute is not one which appears on its face to be destructive of commercial interests or property rights; and, as there is nothing in the complaint indicating a purpose to oppress or destroy, we cannot, nor can any court, presume that there was any other purpose than the just one of regulating the use of essentially dangerous property for the good of the community.

As there is power to regulate the use of property, the measure of regulation must, to a very great extent, be within the discretion of the Legislature. If it is not true that the Legislature may not put some limit upon the pressure employed, and those who transport natural gas may, at their pleasure, employ an unlimited degree of pressure, no matter to what extent persons and property are endangered. If it is not true that the Legislature may, in the exercise of its discretion, and within the scope of its power, determine what the pressure shall be, then no organ of government can determine it. If it be conceded that there is no legislative power to determine the question, and that it may be determined as particular controversies arise, then, the whole matter would depend upon the decision of individual judges or particular juries, and we should have acts criminal in some localities and innocent in others. But principle and authority forbid that the legislative judgment should be disregarded. As the question is presented in this case it is power or no power. As the record stands, there is no middle course, for we may not assume, in the absence of facts, that there was oppression or usurpation. It must be true that the provision of the Act of 1891 regulating the pressure is within the power of the Legislature, or it must be true that the Legislature is absolutely destitute of power over the subject.

The pleading upon which we give judgment in this instance does not require us to decide how far the Legislature may go in regulating the use of property not intrinsically dangerous. A distinctive and conspicuous feature of this case is that the property upon which the Statute operates is dangerous, and is of an extraordinary species and nature. That natural gas is a dangerous agency is a matter of common knowledge; and hence courts take judicial notice of that fact. We know, as the Legislature knew, and as everyone knows, that natural gas is in a high degree inflammable and explosive. Surely no court would require evidence to inform it that artificial gas will ignite and explode, or that gunpowder and dynamite are intrinsically dangerous; and yet with quite as much propriety might it be claimed that without evidence a court cannot know the qualities of any of the things named, as to claim that a court cannot take judicial notice of the qualities of natural gas. But we need not at this place discuss this phase of the subject at length, for the adjudged cases very clearly show that the courts will take judicial notice of the qualities of such things as artificial gas, kerosene, gunpowder, dynamite or the like. Langigan v. New York Gas Light Co. 71 N. Y. 29; Wood v. Northwestern Ina. Co. 48 N. Y. 421; Com. v. Peckham, 2 Gray, 514; Schlicht v. State, 56 Ind. 178; Free v. State, 28 Fla. 267; State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 806; Lohman v. State, 81 Ind. 15.

We may, however, add that courts take judicial notice that natural gas is so far a necessity that the right of eminent domain may be invoked by a corporation to obtain a right of way for its pipes. State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co. 180 Ind. 575, 6 L. R. A. 579; Ottawa Gas & Min. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 832, 14 West. Rep. 92, and cases cited.

It would be unreasonable to hold that the courts know judicially that natural gas is a public necessity so far as to warrant the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and yet hold that they do not know that it is inflammable and explosive. Knowing the one thing, they must know the other. We hold without hesitation that natural gas is so dangerous that its use may be made the subject of a police regulation. Decision after decision recognizes the principle we have stated, and upholds laws regulating the use of property. Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 32 L. ed. 258; Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 33 L. ed. 628; Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 18 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 894; Re Sam Kee, 81 Fed. Rep. 680; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220; Electric Light Co. v. San Francisco, 9 R. & Corp. Cas. 494; State v. Wordin, 56 Conn. 216, 6 New Eng. Rep. 752; Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 7 West. Rep. 418, and authorities cited.

We conclude our discussion of this point by quoting from a recent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States: "Some occupations," said that great court, "by the noise made in their pursuit, some by the odors they engender, and some by the dangers accompanying them, require regulation as to the locality in which they shall be conducted. Some by the dangerous character of the articles used, manufactured or sold require, also, special qualifications in the parties permitted to use, manufacture or sell them. All this is but matter of common knowledge." Crowley v. Christensen, 187 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620.

So far as the facts placed before us by the confessed allegations of the complaint will enable us to judge, there is nothing unreasonable in so regulating the pressure as to keep it down to 800 pounds to the square inch. If the facts were such as to enable us to declare as matter of law that such a regulation was oppressive, unreasonable or subversive of commercial rights, we should perhaps have a different question to determine. But in the pleading upon which we pronounce judgment, there are no facts warranting any inference leading to the overthrow of the statutory provision here involved upon any such ground. When a case arises wherein it legitimately appears that under the pretext of enacting a police regulation the Legislature usurps power, invades property or commercial rights, then the courts will have to deal with questions different from those presented in this case.

The public safety and welfare is the highest consideration in all legislation, and to this consideration private rights must yield. No man has a right to so use a dangerous species of property as to put the safety of others in peril. Liberty does not imply the right of one man to so use property as to endanger the property of others, nor does ownership imply any such right. This is rudimental. It must therefore be true that the owner of property of such a dangerous nature as to require regulation to prevent injury to others can have no right paramount to the police power. It is not too much to say that, as against the police power, there is no such thing as a vested right. If the position of appellee's counsel is tenable, then after a corporation has invested money in natural gas pipes, machinery and appliances, there can be no subsequent legislation, although the use of the pipes bought might put in peril towns, houses and even human life along the entire line. The law is subject to no such reproach, as a rule, like that for which appellees contend would bring upon it. No investment, however great, can so vest a right as to preclude the just exercise of a great governmental power, such as that under which regulations for the protection of the health and safety of persons are enacted. This principle is supported by many decisions. In Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 82, 24 L. ed. 991, it was said: "If the public safety or public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic, the hands of the Legislature cannot be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer."

An emphatic and an unanswerable demonstration of the principle was given in Mugler v. Kansas, 128 U. S. 638, 81 L. ed. 205, given, too, in cases where many thousands of dollars of property was rendered worthless. The principle has found expression in lottery cases, in cases respecting noxious trades and in cases respecting the use of dangerous articles. State v. Woodward, 89 Ind. 110; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 35 L. ed. 1079; Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521, 24 L. ed. 734; New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. Louisiana, L. & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650-672, 29 L. ed. 516-524; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036; State v. Addington, 77 Mo. 110; Stickrod v. Com. 86 Ky. 285; Welsh v. State, 128 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664; Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. 13 How. 368, 14 L. ed. 181.

A familiar application of the principle is that made in the great number of cases which hold that railway companies may be compelled to fence their tracks. The decisions everywhere prove that the police power may sleep, but it does not die. The question when the dormant power shall be aroused is, as we have suggested, one for legislative decision. "Under our system," said the court in Mugler v. Kansas, "that power is lodged with the legislative branch of the government. It belongs to that department to exert what are known as the police powers of the State, and to determine primarily what measures are needful or appropriate for the protection of public morals, the public health or the public safety."

It is a mistake to suppose that regulating the use of property under the police power is a taking without process of law. This seems so clear that it is hardly necessary to cite authorities; but, nevertheless, we cannot forbear quoting from the opinion in Mugler v. Kansas, supra: "A prohibition simply upon the use of property for purposes that are declared by valid legislation to be injurious to the health, morals or safety of the community cannot in any just sense be deemed a taking or appropriation of property for the public benefit. Such legislation does not disturb the owner in the control or use of his property for lawful purposes, nor restrict his right to dispose of it."

In the case at our bar, there is no taking of property; there is simply a regulation of its use, leaving the ownership untouched. No owner has a right to use property in such a mode as to endanger the public safety, and hence, no rights of ownership are impaired in a statute which protects the public safety by a reasonable regulation of the use of dangerous property.

We are satisfied that no provision of our State Constitution is violated by the Act of 1891, and that it is not antagonistic to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Federal Constitution, nor to any provision of that instrument protecting vested or contract rights.

The general question which remains is that presented by the contention that the Act of 1891 violates the provisions of the Federal Constitution vesting in Congress power over commerce between the States.

We preface our discussion of the principal question stated by saying that we are here concerned only with the general question of the power to regulate the pressure upon natural gas in pipes, for, according to the averments of the complaint, whether natural or artificial pressure be employed, the contract between the two corporations named cannot be made effective without violating the Act of 1891 by using more pressure than 800 pounds to the square inch. If there is power to regulate the pressure, then the corporation of which the appellant is a member ought not to be allowed to execute the contract described, since, under the confessed allegations of the complaint, it is impossible for one of the corporations to act without violating the Statute. Courts are always reluctant to strike down a statute or to decide constitutional questions; and they only decide them when imperatively necessary. Even then they decide only such as are absolutely essential to a disposition of the case, and are fully and clearly in the record. Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 7.

Whether the Act of 1891 usurps powers vested in Congress is to be determined from the language employed by its framers. If the language expressly or by necessary and unavoidable implication assumes to regulate interstate commerce, the Act is a nullity. There is, however, no express regulation of interstate commerce, nor do we think that the necessary effect of the Statute, when construed according to settled rules of law, is to limit or restrain commerce. If it were necessary to sustain the Statute, and necessary to a decision of this case, as made by the record, to construe the Statute as simply limiting artificial pressure to 800 pounds, it would be our duty to so construe it, since that would be a sounder conclusion, in view of the provisions of the Statute, than the conclusion that the Legislature intended to enact a statute which must be deemed a nullity. The rule is that, "before proceeding to annul by judicial sentence what has been enacted by the law-making power, it should clearly appear that the Act cannot be supported by any reasonable intentment or allowable presumption." People v. Orange County Supra. 17 N. Y. 285-241.

We have no right to presume that the Legislature usurped power or disregarded the organic law. No precedent will justify such a presumption, nor any reason sustain it. A party who asserts that the Legislature has usurped power or has violated the Constitution must affirmatively and clearly establish his position.

Nor have the courts the right to so construe a statute as to render it void where a construction that is reasonably admissible will uphold it. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 218.

This is elementary law. We are therefore not dealing with a case where there is nothing more than a question as to the meaning and effect of a statute. We are to resolve doubts in favor of the validity of the Statute without, as an able court has said, "stopping to inquire what construction might be warranted by the natural import of the language used." Dow v. Sayward, 14 N. H. 16-18.

It is our plain duty to uphold the Statute if it can be done by just intendment and reasonable presumption, and the questions in the record do not require us to do more than decide upon the general question of the power to regulate the conveyance of natural gas in pipes.

Nothing in the words of the Statute expresses or indicates a purpose to usurp a federal power. If there be any such usurpation, it is because of the effect of the Statute and not because of any direct attempts to regulate interstate commerce; but we have no right to ascribe any such effect to the Statute if any other fair and reasonable effects can be given it. We are not to destroy a statute when it can be fairly avoided.

A further prefatory suggestion seems appropriate, and that is this: The Statute makes no discrimination; it operates upon all alike. It affects the citizens of Indiana as it does others and not differently. We know, as a matter of common knowledge, as all courts must know, that there are parts of our State farther distant from the gas fields than are parts of the States by which ours is bounded. It cannot, therefore, be implied that the Statute was directed against the citizens of other States.

In considering the principal question, two things are important, (1) locality, and (2) the character of natural gas. Of these in their order.

The pipes for the transportation of the gas must be laid in our soil; they must cross our farms, pass through our towns, and cross our highways. There are many persons, many houses and much property along the line within the borders of our State. There is danger to our inhabitants, and to their property from the use of defective or insecure pipes, as well as from an improper use of them. If a volatile, inflammable and explosive substance, such as natural gas, cannot be conveyed in pipes under an unsafe pressure without danger to those whom it is the duty of the Commonwealth to protect, then regulation is not unreasonable or illegal in itself. The danger is to our citizens in their own homes, and on our own thoroughfares. It cannot, we suppose, be successfully asserted that a gas company could use pipes of paper, or of spider webs at their pleasure, and yet, if there is no power in the State to regulate the character of the pipes or the like, this conclusion must result; they indeed may do what they please. The danger to be avoided is within the State. The protection of the law ought, upon every principle of justice, to be commensurate with the danger. The legislation is local, is for local protection, and presumptively at law for no other purpose. Gas companies acquire the right to lay pipes by virtue of the power of eminent domain resident in the State, and, surely, if they take the benefit of our laws and use our lands and minerals, they must yield obedience to such laws as are framed for the local protection. If they seize private property and occupy highways under local laws, they must conform to those laws in using privileges vouchsafed to them. The right to lay pipes, to sink wells, and to do similar things is local in every particular. It is from first to last local; it is so in the acquisition of the original right, and in the exercise of the right acquired. It is certainly as essentially and characteristically local as the right to erect telegraph poles, conduct laundries or operate elevators, and over these things the State may legislate, although the legislation may indirectly or incidentally affect commerce. It seems true beyond fair controversy that the State by virtue of its inherent power may provide that pipes shall be laid in trenches, or shall be of sufficient strength to be safe; otherwise they might be laid on the ground, subject to the action of the elements, or be of inadequate strength and thus be fruitful of danger to persons and property. It also seems entirely clear that the State may declare that gas shall not be confined in insufficient tanks or reservoirs, as is done respecting petroleum in States where it is obtained. If it be true that such regulations may be made, it must also be true that pressure may be regulated and that the State must, to a great extent, be the judge of the nature and character of the regulations required.

The local character of such a substance as natural gas is, we repeat, marked and peculiar. It is a natural product and its source is in the soil or rocks of the earth. It is as strikingly local as coal, or petroleum, and yet no one has ever questioned the power of a State to enact laws governing mining. If it be not true that the mining and conveyance of natural gas may be regulated for the protection of persons and property, it must be true that many mining laws are void. Coal oil is subject to inspection and regulation, and so must be natural gas; for it is more dangerous than coal oil. It is so essentially local that only local regulations can be effective or appropriate. It is found in very few localities, and the character of locality is impressed upon it more clearly and strongly than upon almost any other natural product in the world.

We have considered (very briefly, however, because time presses) the question of the power to regulate the use of natural gas because of the local character of the product upon principle, and we now briefly consider the question upon authority. The decisions clearly recognize a distinction between local and general matters. Necessarily, this must be so, or else there would be no power in the State to declare where telegraph poles shall be placed, or at what speed railroad trains should be run through populous towns, or where noxious trades shall be conducted. To deny the power to regulate the use of a product so clearly and exclusively local as natural gas would be to annihilate the police powers of the State. The principle which we here enforce is thus stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Western Union Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 123 U.

§. 347, 80 L. ed. 1187: "Undoubtedly under the reserved powers of the State, which are designated under that somewhat ambiguous term of police powers, regulations may be prescribed by the State for the good order, peace and protection of the community. The subjects upon which the State may act are almost infinite, yet in its regulations with respect to all of them, there is this necessary limitation, that the State does not thereby encroach upon the free exercise of the power vested in Congress by the Constitution. Within that limitation it may undoubtedly make all necessary provisions with respect to buildings, poles, and wires of telegraph companies in its jurisdiction which the comfort and convenience of the community may require."

If regulations may be made concerning buildings and wires used by telegraph companies, it is impossible to conceive why they may not be made concerning pumps, pipes or the like of natural gas companies. There is infinitely more reason why the power should exist in the one case than in the other, since natural gas is a local product, intrinsically dangerous, and can only be conveyed from place to place in a peculiar mode.

There is another phase of the subject upon which the element of locality exerts an important influence. The local and peculiar character of natural gas makes it almost impossible that it should be the subject of a general national regulation.

The principle here involved is affirmed in the strongest case that the appellees have adduced in support of their position. In that case, Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 109, 84 L. ed. 183, Fuller, Ch. J., speaking for the majority of the court, said: "Where the subject matter requires a uniform system, as between the States, the power controlling it is vested exclusively in Congress, and cannot be encroach upon by the States, but where, in relation to the subject matter, different rules may be suitable for different localities, the States may exercise powers, which, though they may be said to partake of the nature of the power granted to the general government, are strictly not such, but are simply local powers, which have full operation until, or unless circumscribed by the action of Congress in effectuation of the general power." Cooley v. Wardens of Port of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 18 L. ed. 996. But the principle had long before been stated in stronger and clearer terms, and it has been often asserted and enforced. Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 135, 24 L. ed. 87; Sherlock v. Ailing, 98 U. S. 99, 28 L. ed. 819; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Quachita v. Aiken, 121 U. S. 447, 80 L. ed. 977; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. Co. v. Louisiana, 118 U. S. 464, 80 L. ed. 241.

Upon this point we affirm that natural gas is characteristically and peculiarly a local product, that its production is confined to a limited territory, that because of its local characteristics and peculiarities, it is a proper subject for state legislation, and cannot, so far as regards local protection, be made the subject of general legislation by Congress, or, at all events, that it does "not require a uniform system as between the States," for its regulation.

We come now to a consideration of the question of the inherent dangerous qualities of natural gas as affecting the power of the State to regulate its use. We have already declared that it is a dangerous substance, requiring regulation, and we shall only add to what we have said a quotation from the opinion in the case of State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 807: "It was not necessary," said the court, "to aver that coal oil is inflammable or to prove it. Courts and juries will take cognizance of such matters as are of common knowledge and pertain to the experience and affairs of almost every man's daily life. Courts do not require proof that fire will burn or powder explode, or gas illuminate, or that many other processes in nature and art produce certain known effects. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 56; Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 87, 23 L. ed. 200; Uddersook's Case, 76 Pa. 340; Garth v. Caldwell, 72 Mo. 632; Nagel v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 75 Mo. 665, 666."

As natural gas is dangerous, it is a proper subject for police regulation, and the affirmation of this proposition is a sufficient refutation of appellee's argument that it may be assumed that the Statute, under guise of the police power, attempts to regulate interstate commerce, and thus usurp a federal power. What the rule would be if natural gas were an article not dangerous, such as corn, wheat or the like, we need not inquire, since the record does not present any such question.

The rule that courts take notice of geographical, historical or natural facts extends far and is an unbending one. In the case of Jones v. United States, 187 U. S. 202, 84 L. ed. 691, the supreme court fully reviewed the authorities and declared that averments in a pleading would be disregarded in every instance where the court judicially knew that they were not true. We cannot quote at length from the opinion, but must content ourselves with saying that it asserts in the strongest possible terms that what is judicially known to be false no pleading can effectively aver to be true. The practical application of this old and familiar doctrine to this case requires us to assert that the courts judicially know that natural gas is a local product that cannot be handled, stored or transported as an ordinary commercial commodity without imperiling life and property.

If natural gas cannot be safely transported to a State distant from its source it is because of its natural qualities, and not because of legislation. The restriction upon transportation, if there be any, is in the inherent nature of the thing itself; none is put upon it by the Statute, since the Statute does no more than regulate its conveyance from the wells to points of distribution in such a mode as to protect lives and property. This it does and nothing more. If the distribution within the State cannot be made at a safe pressure, it is because of the character of the local natural product, not because of any standard of pressure fixed by legislation. Fixing the standard of pressure is not a regulation of interstate commerce; possibly, it might be different if the product were not a local one and intrinsically dangerous; but natural gas is local and is dangerous in its transportation and use. It is the inherent element of danger that makes it necessary to handle, store and transport natural gas in peculiar modes and under reasonable restrictions.

It is true that natural gas may be an article of commerce, but it is not an ordinary article of commerce. It is not a commercial commodity while in the earth; it is only so when it ceases to become real estate and becomes personal property. It cannot in any event become an ordinary article of merchandise in which no dangerous elements combine. In a limited and qualified sense, it is a commercial commodity, but the limitation is not put upon it by any statute; that is done by nature. It is, no doubt, so far a commercial commodity that this State cannot prohibit its transportation to another State by direct legislation. State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & M. Co. 120 Ind. 575, 6 L. R. A. 579.

If it can be taken from the well and transported to another State under a safe pressure, the State cannot prohibit its transportation; nor can the State establish one standard of pressure for its own citizens and another standard for the citizens of other States. But nothing of the kind is attempted, directly or indirectly, for, as we have shown, there is one standard and no prohibition. The standard is for all. If it is such as will allow the transportation of natural gas to other States, there is no restriction or burden upon interstate commerce. If there is a prohibition in any sense or to any extent it is in the nature of the commodity itself; but there is no prohibition.

We have shown, as we believe, that natural gas, because of its local nature and intrinsic qualities, cannot be made the subject of general commerce between the States; and have thus established the conclusion that it cannot, so far as local safety is concerned, be made the subject of uniform federal legislation, but is a legitimate subject for reasonable police regulation. But if it be conceded that it is the subject of general commerce between the States, it may, nevertheless, be the subject of legislation by the State in so far as the regulation is local. In every case in which there is an authoritative decision upon the question, it is affirmed that the States may make police regulations, although articles of commerce may be affected by such regulations. Interstate commerce, it is true, can neither be burdened nor restricted. State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co. supra.

But the establishment of a reasonable police regulation for local safety is neither a burden nor a restriction, within the meaning of the law, since, if there be lawful exercise of a governmental power, there can be no wrong. Our own cases recognize the power to enact reasonable police regulations concerning articles of commerce. Ibid.

But our decisions are of comparatively little importance upon this question, since the question is one to be determined by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The most familiar instances of the exercise of police power over commercial commodities are those wherein intoxicating liquors were the subject of legislation, and it has been uniformly held that such commodities are subject to State authority. Orowley v. Christensen and Mugler v. Kansas. supra. and authorities cited.

In asserting this we are not unmindful of the decision in Letsy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, but that decision is easily discriminated from the class of cases to which we have referred, as well as from the case before us. In Letsy v. Hardin the state legislation was condemned because it operated directly upon an ordinary and world-wide article of commerce. We do not assume that a State can legislate for the regulation of interstate commerce,—that power is undoubtedly federal,—nor do we assume that under the guise of exercising the police power there may be a regulation of commerce between the States; but we do assume that it is settled by the decisions that state legislation is not invalid simply because it operates upon, or affects, commercial commodities or instrumentalities. So long as there is nothing more than an exercise of the police power, and no regulation of commerce, there is nothing more than the exercise of a state power. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 539, 10 L. ed. 1060, Judge Story, speaking for the court, said: "The police power belonging to the States in virtue of their general sovereignty, extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the State, and has never been conceded to the United States."

This general doctrine is affirmed in many cases, and it is conceded in the majority opinion in Letsy v. Hardin. We know that the decision in that case affirms that where the whole subject is federal, the States can exercise no power, but that doctrine we neither dispute nor deny; although we do affirm that it is not applicable to such a case as this. In affirming that state police regulations may rightfully operate upon articles of commerce, we do not affirm that commerce may be regulated. If police regulations cannot operate upon articles of commerce, then there are few kinds of personal property upon which they can operate. To deny that state legislation can operate upon commodities that are commercial is to practically annihilate it, for it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive any species of personal property that is not commercial. But it is by no means only property such as intoxicating liquors upon which the police power of a State may be exercised. In the case of United States v. De Witt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 593, a penalty was imposed by the United States statute upon any person who should offer for sale oil manufactured from petroleum, unless it was of a designated specific gravity, and it was held such a power belonged to the police power of the State. A similar question came before the court in Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115, and the state statute was upheld. The opinion in that case so fully and ably discusses the question that we cannot forbear quoting from it at some length. The learned judge by whom the court spoke said:

"In the American constitutional system," says Mr. Cooley, "the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and cannot be assumed by the national government." Cooley, Const. Lim. 574. While it is confessedly difficult to mark the precise boundaries of that power, or to indicate by any general rule the exact limitations which the States must observe in its exercise, the existence of such a power in the States has been uniformly recognized in this court. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Licenses Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How.

"It is embraced in what Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons v. Ogden, calls that 'immense mass of legislation' which can be most advantageously exercised by the States, and over which the national authorities cannot assume supervision or control. 'If the power only extends to a just legislation of rights, with a view to the due protection and enjoyment of all, and does not deprive anyone of that which is justly and properly his own, it is obvious that its possession by the State, and its exercise for the regulation of the property and actions of its citizens, cannot well constitute an invasion of national jurisdiction or afford a basis for an appeal to the protection of the national authorities.' Cooley, Const. Lim. 574.

"By the settled doctrines of this court the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health and the property of the community against the injurious exercise by any citizen of his own rights. State legislation, strictly and legitimately for police purposes, does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily intrench upon any authority which has been confided, expressly or by implication, to the national government. The Kentucky statute under examination manifestly belongs to that class of legislation. It is, in the best sense, a mere police regulation, deemed essential for the protection of the lives and property of citizens. It expresses in the most solemn form the deliberate judgment of the State that burning fluids which ignite or permanently burn at less than a prescribed temperature are unsafe for illuminating purposes. Whether the policy thus pursued by the State is wise or unwise, it is not the province of a national authority to determine. That belongs to each State, under its own sense of duty, and in view of the provisions of its own Constitution. Its action in those respects is beyond the corrective power of this court. That the Statute of 1874 is a police regulation within the meaning of the authorities is clear from our decision in United States v. De Witt, 78 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 593. By the Internal Revenue Act of March 2, 1867, a penalty was imposed upon any person who should knowingly sell or keep for sale, or offer for sale, such mixture, or who should sell or offer for sale oil made from petroleum for illuminating purposes inflammable at less temperature or fire test than 110 degrees Fahrenheit. We held that to be simply a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States; that, although emanating from Congress, it could have by its own force no constitutional operation within state limits, and was without effect, except where the legislative authority of Congress excluded, territorially, all state legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia."

The principle we have stated is involved in the cases where regulations were made respecting the instrumentalities of commerce. It is involved in the very numerous cases already mentioned, requiring railroads to fence their tracks. It is involved in cases requiring trains to stop at the crossing of other railroads, and in many other cases of like character. It is strongly and broadly asserted in the cases which hold valid state statutes requiring trainmen or engineers to be examined as to their qualifications, as well as in cases concerning pilots. Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 33 L. ed. 852; Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 28 L. ed. 819; Cooley v. Wardens of Port of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996; Ex parte McNeil, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624; The Panama, Deady, 37; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 385, 25 L. ed. 722; Wilson v. McNamee, 102 U. S. 572, 26 L. ed. 234; State v. Penny, 19 S. C. 218.

In the first of the cases cited, it was said: "The width of the gauge, the character of the grades, the mode of crossing the streams by culverts and bridges, the kinds of cuts and tunnels, the mode of crossing other highways, the placing of watchmen and signals at points of special danger, the rate of speed at stations and through villages, towns and cities, are all matters naturally and peculiarly within the provisions of the law, from the authority of which the modern highways of commerce derive their existence. The rules prescribed for their construction and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property otherwise endangered by their use are strictly within the limits of the local law. They are not, per se, regulations of commerce," etc.

The provision of our Statute of 1891, limiting the pressure upon natural gas confined in pipes, is certainly as essentially a police regulation as any of the acts enumerated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case from which we have quoted. It is equally as clear that it is not per se a regulation of interstate commerce. Pipes are local vehicles of conveying the dangerous product, and pressure is the power locally employed.

The decisions relied upon by the appellees do not oppose the conclusion that the use of such an article as natural gas may be regulated. In our own case of State v. Indiana, & O. O. G. & Min. Co., supra, the statute was in terms a regulation of commerce between the States, and moreover was an absolute inhibition upon the exportation of natural gas, so that the decision there made is not in point. Of Leisy v. Hardin, we need only say, in addition to what has been already said, that the state law there overthrown by a majority of the court was a direct prohibition of the sale of a general article of commerce in its original form, not a regulation of its use. It is obvious that regulating the use of a dangerous article is a very different thing from prohibiting its sale, and still wider is the difference where, as here, the article is inherently dangerous, and not of an ordinary commercial character. The cases of Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 375, 23 L. ed. 347; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691,—involved the power of a State to levy a tax upon interstate commerce, and are not of controlling force upon such a question as that before us, because they are not relevant to the point in dispute. The case of Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 135 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, involved the validity of a state statute absolutely prohibiting the importation of a commercial commodity, and it is without influence here, for here we have no such question. Mobile County v. Kimball, 103 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 288, decides that a municipal corporation may be authorized to issue bonds to improve a harbor, but decides nothing that lends support to the appellee's assault upon the Act of 1891. It does, however, contain statements that give strong support to the proposition that local matters may be regulated by state laws, although they are connected with interstate commerce.

The cases of Ohy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550, and Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543, relate entirely to the power of a State to regulate immigration and pour little or no light upon the question with which we are here concerned. In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527, it was held that a State could not prohibit the importation of cattle, but here we have no such question, for here there is no prohibition; there is merely the regulation of the mode of conveying from the wells a local product, of an intrinsically dangerous nature. The case of Kimmish v. Ball, 129 U. S. 217, 32 L. ed. 695, modifies the decision in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, or, at least, explains it. But in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen it was said: "Many acts of a State may, indeed, affect commerce without amounting to a regulation of it in the constitutional sense of the term."

This doctrine is directly applicable here, for here the Statute regulates the use of a dangerous substance, and thus incidentally affects commerce; but it is not a regulation of commerce "in the constitutional sense of the term." A regulation of the mode of using property is not necessarily prohibition or restriction, and the Statute before us is no more than such a regulation. The opinions in the cases of Minnesota v. Barber, 186 U. S. 813, 34 L. ed. 455, and Brimmer v. Reban, 188 U. S. 78, 34 L. ed. 863, were written by the same great judge, Mr. Justice Harlan, who wrote the opinions in Patterson v. Kentucky and in Smith v. Alabama, and there is in them not the slightest intimation of a departure from the doctrines of former cases; on the contrary, those doctrines are adhered to, and the Meat Inspection Laws were condemned because they discriminated against the citizens of other States. In the latter case it is said: "The case in principle is not distinguishable from Minnesota v. Barber, where an inspection statute of Minnesota, relating to fresh beef, mutton, lamb and pork was held to be a regulation of interstate commerce and void, because by its necessary operation it excluded from the markets of that State, practically, all such meats—in whatever form, and although entirely sound and fit for human food—from animals slaughtered in other States."

The difference between the meat inspection cases and the present is essential and clear. Here, there is no discrimination; here, there is nothing more than the regulation of a natural, local and intrinsically dangerous product, while in the inspection cases there was discrimination, indeed, absolute prohibition, and the article was not dangerous, nor of a local or unusual character.

In Minnesota v. Barber the court shows very clearly the difference between that case and the case of Patterson v. Kentucky (which is cited with approval), and in doing this proves that the principle asserted in Patterson v. Kentucky rules here, and that the doctrine of Minnesota v. Barber is not relevant to such a question as the one presented by the ruling upon the complaint before us.

The trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, for in thus ruling it adjudged that the provision of the Act of 1891, regulating the pressure that may be placed upon natural gas confined in pipes, was void. That was the question before it upon the complaint, and it is the question before us. The effect of this ruling was to adjudge that the appellant's complaint did not state a cause of action, for the reason that the statutory provision referred to was, upon the case stated by the pleading, unconstitutional. Beyond that case the trial court could not justly go, nor can we.

For the error in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint the judgment is reversed.

McBride, J.:

The Legislature may undoubtedly provide for the regulation of the mode of procuring, using and transporting natural gas. In so far as the Act of March 4, 1891, attempts to do this, it is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State, and not an interference with the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. Section 1 of the Act, however, contains a provision which, literally construed, forbids the transportation of natural gas through pipes, otherwise than by the natural pressure of the gas flowing from the wells, and section 2 contains a provision which, similarly construed, declares it to be unlawful to use any device or artificial process or appliance to maintain the natural flow of natural gas. These provisions are not in the nature of regulations, but are prohibitory in their character. There are, however, independent provisions, which may be eliminated from the Statute without materially impairing its sufficiency, if its purpose is simply to regulate the production, transportation and use of natural gas. As I understand the principal opinion, it holds that notwithstanding these provisions of the Statute, artificial pressure may be applied, provided it does not exceed 800 pounds to the square inch. Whether this conclusion is reached by construction or by eliminating the objectionable features of the Statute is not material. I concur in the conclusion reached.

Olds, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the main opinion in this case. There are many propositions stated in the main opinion, and ably discussed and supported by copious quotations and citations of authorities; with some of which I agree, but do not regard them as decisive of the questions involved in this case. As it seems to me, the question as to the validity of the complaint depends upon the validity and construction of the Act of the Legislature of Indiana passed by the General Assembly March 4, 1891, which is as follows:

"An Act to Regulate the Mode of Procuring, Transporting and Using Natural Gas, and Declaring an Emergency."

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, that any person or persons, firm, company or corporation engaged in drilling for, piping, transporting, using or selling natural gas, may transport or conduct the same through sound wrought or cast iron casings and pipes, tested to at least four hundred pounds to the square inch, provided such gas shall not be transported through pipes at a pressure exceeding three hundred pounds per square inch, nor otherwise than by the natural pressure of the gas flowing from the wells.

"Sec. 2. It is hereby declared to be unlawful for any person or persons, firm, company or corporation to use any device for pumping, or any other artificial process or appliance for the purpose, or that shall have the effect of increasing the natural flow of natural gas from any well, or of increasing or maintaining the flow of natural gas through the pipes used for conveying and transporting the same.

"Sec. 3. Any person or persons, firm, company or corporation violating any of the provisions of this Act shall be fined in any sum not less than one thousand dollars nor more than ten thousand dollars, and may be enjoined from conveying and transporting natural gas through pipes otherwise than as in this Act provided: provided, that nothing in this section shall operate to prevent the use of nitro-glycerine or other explosives for shooting any well or wells from which the gas is procured.

"Sec. 4. It is hereby declared that an emergency exists for the immediate taking effect of this Act, and the same shall take effect from and after its passage."

In my opinion, the decision is erroneous. The law does not seem to me to have been framed with an intention, or with an effort on the part of the General Assembly, to exercise the legitimate police power vested in the State. It does not attempt to regulate the transportation of natural gas; but its sole purpose is to prohibit the transportation, sale and use of gas beyond the distance which the natural pressure from the well will transport it. Strictly construed, according to the letter, it does not permit its transportation through pipes at the natural well pressure, if such pressure exceeds 800 pounds to the square inch, nor does it permit any artificial method or device to increase the natural well pressure to that standard, if the well pressure should be below the amount of pressure designated. The statute upon its face admits that the transportation of gas at a pressure of 800 pounds to the square inch through sound wrought or cast-iron casings and pipes tested to at least 400 pounds to the square inch is safe; yet it prohibits the increase of the pressure of a well of less pressure than that degree, and prohibits any transportation by artificial methods, even to this extent, though admitting it is safe to do so.

In the case of State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co., 120 Ind. 575, 6 L. R. A. 579, this court said: "In order to give any force to this contention, it is necessary to determine at the outset whether natural gas can be considered an article of commerce. With this preliminary question we have but little difficulty. Natural gas is as much an article of commerce as iron ore, coal, petroleum or any other of the like products of the earth. It is a commodity which may be transported, and it is an article which may be bought and sold in the market of the country." In support of this proposition, the following authorities were cited: Citizens Gas & M. Co. v. Elwood, 114 Ind. 332, 14 West. Rep. 92; Carother's App. 118 Pa. 468, 11 Cent. Rep. 48; Columbia Conduit Co. v. Com. 90 Pa. 307; West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Volcanic O. & C. Co. 5 W. Va. 382; The Daniel Ball, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 999; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346.

This court further said: "The gas in the earth may not be a commercial commodity; but, when brought to the surface and placed in pipes for transportation, it must assume that character as completely as coal on the cars or petroleum in the tanks."

The doctrine contained in the quotations which I have made from State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co., supra, is well supported by authority, and with it I most fully concur. That gas and petroleum are to some extent inflammable, explosive and dangerous I am free to admit; and that courts take judicial knowledge of the fact. But coal is in common use for fuel, petroleum in common use for lighting purposes, and to some extent for fuel; natural gas in the communities where it is mined and has been carried through pipes, is in common use as fuel and for heating purposes, and to some extent for lighting purposes; and but few or any more accidents or deaths occur from its use than do from the use of coal or petroleum. We read of accidents and deaths occurring in various ways from the use of coal and petroleum, as well as natural gas. As well might the Legislature of the various States within the borders of which there are oil fields pass a law prohibiting the pumping of the oil from wells and the transportation of the same to any greater distance than its natural flow from the wells will carry it, while admitting that it can be safely transported in casks and tanks, as to say that the Legislatures, while admitting that natural gas may be transported with safety in pipes at a pressure to the extent of three fourths of the tested pressure of the pipes, prohibit its transportation by artificial methods or devices in the same safe manner by a pressure not exceeding three fourths the tested pressure of the pipes through which it is transported; either of which propositions seem to me to be a prohibition, an interference with commerce, against the rights of citizens in the free disposition of their property and unfounded in law.

It is not necessary, in this case, to deny that the Legislature has a right to exercise police power over the transportation of natural gas. Admitting that it has, and can, exercise it to a reasonable extent, so as to prevent its transportation in a careless, reckless and unsafe manner, unnecessarily endangering its citizens, I do affirm that the Legislature can only exercise this power to a reasonable extent, so as to secure its transportation in a safe manner, as not to unnecessarily endanger the citizens of the State; and that it cannot, under the color of exercising a police power, absolutely prohibit its transportation and sale in a safe manner to suitable markets; and the latter is what is attempted to be done by this statute. The statute, conceding that natural gas can be transported in the manner stated, prohibits its transportation beyond the distance it will naturally flow from the wells, which as admitted in argument is not to exceed sixty or seventy miles at farthest. As said in the case of State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co., supra, natural gas is an article of commerce, and the owner of it may sell it for use within the distance which it may be transported by the natural flow of the well, or beyond such distance; and it may be transported in a proper and safe manner beyond that distance by artificial methods, and this cannot be prohibited by legislative enactment.

In the case of Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 99-110, after citing and quoting from numerous authorities in speaking of the police power of the State, the court says: "These citations are sufficient to show that the police power is not without limitation, and that in its exercise the Legislature must respect the great fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. If this were otherwise, the power of the Legislature would be practically without limitation. In the assumed exercise of the police power in the interest of the health, the welfare or the safety of the public, every right of the citizen might be invaded and every constitutional barrier swept away."

Generally, it is for the Legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed to protect the public health and secure the public comfort and safety; and while its measures are calculated, intended, convenient and appropriate to accomplish these ends, the exercise of its discretion is not subject to review by the courts. But they must have some relation to these ends; under the mere guise of police regulations, personal rights and private property cannot be arbitrarily invaded and the determination of the Legislature is not final or conclusive. If it passes an Act ostensibly for the public health and thereby destroys or takes away the property of a citizen or interferes with his personal liberty, then it is for the courts to scrutinize the act and see whether it really relates to, and is convenient and appropriate to promote the public health. It matters not that the Legislature may, in the title of the Act or in its body, declare that it is intended for the improvement of public health. Such a declaration does not conclude the courts, and they must yet determine the fact declared and enforce the supreme law."

In the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, the eminent jurist, Justice Harlan, speaking for the highest court of the world, said: "If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge and thereby give effect to the Constitution." See Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 320, 34 L. ed. 458.

It will not be controverted that the owner of land is not the owner of gas mined upon his own land; that it is his property. The right of private property includes the right to dispose of all one's legal acquisitions without illegal restraint or diminution. These principles are almost as old as the law itself. The Constitution of the United States provides that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

The Constitution of Indiana, in the Bill of Rights, declares that "all men are endowed with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." It is also declared that "no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation."

See the following authorities as bearing upon the questions involved in the case: Hennecy v. St. Paul, 37 Fed. Rep. 585; Cole v. Keyler, 84 Iowa, 59; Harvey v. Devoody, 18 Ark. 252-261; State v. Mott, 61 Md. 297; Manhattan Mfg. & F. Co. v. Van Keuren, 23 N. J. Eq. 251; Glenn v. Baltimore, 5 Gill & J. 424; Bills v. Belknap, 36 Iowa, 583; Everett v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 66; Quinton v. Burton, 61 Iowa, 471; Everett v. Marquette, 53 Mich. 450; Ames v. Port Huron Log. D. & B. Co. 11 Mich. 139; Sedgwick, Stat. and Const. L. p. 534; New Albany & S. R. Co. v. Peterson, 14 Ind. 112; Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324; Greencastle v. Hazlett, 23 Ind. 186; Haldeman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514; Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. 528; Taylor v. Fickas, 64 Ind. 172; Angell, Water-courses, §§ 94-135; State v. Woodruff S. & P. Coach Co. 114 Ind. 155, 18 West. Rep. 311; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Huse, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 228; Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 446, 29 L. ed. 691; Loisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455; Brimmer v. Redman, 138 U. S. 78, 34 L. ed. 862.

It is clearly apparent that the Statute in question had for its purpose the prohibition of the transportation of natural gas, and confining its use and sale to a limited territory, curtailing its use, diminishing its value, abridging the rights of the owners and other persons who might wish to buy and transport it to markets beyond the distance which the natural well pressure will carry it, absolutely forbidding its use and sale beyond a small territory, wherein it can be distributed by the natural well pressure; and if subject to be safely transported into other States, it necessarily interferes with interstate commerce.

I have hurriedly and briefly stated some of the objections to the constitutionality of the law. No good can be accomplished by extending this opinion and discussing each question involved separately and supporting the positions by authority. I believe the law to be unconstitutional and void for several reasons; and the law being void, the complaint was bad and the demurrer was properly sustained.

To uphold the law at all, it is necessary to strike out all the Legislature has said in such emphatic terms that no artificial methods can be used in transporting natural gas, or even in keeping up its pressure; and interpolate in lieu thereof an allegation that artificial methods may be used to the extent of 800 pounds to the square inch in pipes tested to the strength of 400 pounds to the square inch. In view of the absolute and positive prohibition against the use of any artificial methods expressed in the Statute, it seems to me no such intention can be attributed to the Legislature, or such a construction given to the law.

INDIANA STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

(....Ind....)

A state board of agriculture created a body corporate with perpetual succession including as ex officio members the president of each county agricultural society, and which is in a sense an educational institution required to hold an annual meeting and receive reports from county societies and make an annual report to the Legislature, its funds having been received for the most part from other sources than the State, is a private and not a public corporation, although no shares of stock are issued.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate, and to have an Act of the Legislature abolishing plaintiff and transferring its assets to a State Agricultural Board thereby created declared to be null and void. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. C. Harris for appellants.

Messrs. McDonald, Butler & Snow for appellee.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellee, the Indiana State Board of Agriculture, a corporation created under an Act entitled: "An Act for the Encouragement of Agriculture, Approved February 14, 1851," against the appellants claiming to act as individuals and as a state agricultural and industrial board, created by an Act of the Legislature of 1891, entitled: "An Act Abolishing the State Board of Agriculture and Transferring all its Assets, Liabilities and Credits to a State Agricultural Board; Providing for the Creation of the State Agricultural and Industrial Board," etc., which became a law by lapse of time without the governor's signature, March 4, 1891, to quiet the title to certain real estate described in the complaint and known as the state fair grounds, to declare null and void appellant's claims of ownership and enjoining them from setting up any interest in or ownership of said real estate; and to have said Act of the Legislature of 1891 declared unconstitutional and void; also asking the same relief as to the personal property, and asking that appellee be declared the owner of appropriations made by an Act of the Legislature approved February 28, 1889, appropriating for the use of the appellee $10,000 annually for five years; two of which annual appropriations have been paid to the appellee. On the trial of the cause in the court below, final judgment and decree was entered in favor of the appellee quieting title of the appellee in the real estate; that the Act of the Legislature of 1891 was unconstitutional and void; that appellee is the owner of the personal property and that the appellee is the owner of the unpaid appropriation and entitled to receive the payment of the same; and perpetually enjoining the appellants, either as individuals or as a state board under the Act of 1881, from claiming or asserting any title or ownership of the real estate, personal property or said appropriation, or demanding or receiving possession of either or any part of the same.

We deem it unnecessary to set out or make any further statement of the pleadings or issues in the case, or the manner in which the question for decision is presented, as it is conceded that the sole question presented for the decision of this court is whether or not the appellee, the Indiana State Board of Agriculture, is a private corporation. If it is a private corporation, then the Legislature exceeded its powers by the passage of the Act of 1891, and such Act is unconstitutional and void and the judgment must be affirmed. But if such Board is a public corporation, a state institution, belonging to the State and subject to legislative control, then said Act of the Legislature is valid and the judgment must be reversed. The question must be determined by the construction to be placed on the Act of the Legislature approved February 14, 1851, by which the Indiana State Board of Agriculture was incorporated. So much of the Act as is material for the decision of this case reads as follows:

"An Act for the Encouragement of Agriculture, approved February 14, 1851."

"Sec. 4. That Joseph A. Wright of Marion County, Alexander C. Stevenson of Putnam County, Jeremiah McBride of Martin, Roland Willard of Kosciusko, Jacob R. Harris of Switzerland, Henry L. Ellsworth of Tippecanoe, John Ratliff of Morgan, Joseph Orr of LaPorte, David P. Holloway of Wayne, John P. Kelley of Warrick, William McLean of Lawrence, Samuel Emerson of Knox, John McMahon of Washington, Thomas W. Sweney of Allen, George Brown of Shelby and George Hussey of Vigo, be and they are hereby created a body corporate, with perpetual succession in the manner hereafter described, under the name and style of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture.

"Sec. 5. It shall be the duty of said Board, or any five of them, to meet in the City of Indianapolis at such time as the governor shall appoint, and to organize by appointing a president, secretary and treasurer, and such other officers as they may deem necessary; also, determine by lot the time each member shall serve, so that the term of service of one half of the members shall expire annually, on the day of the annual meeting in January; and the president shall have power to call meetings of the Board whenever he may deem it expedient.

"Sec. 6. There shall be held in the City of Indianapolis on the first Thursday after the first Monday in January, an annual meeting of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture, to gether with the president of each county agricultural society, or other delegate therefrom duly authorized; who shall, for the time being, be ex officio members of the State Board of Agriculture for the purpose of deliberation and consultation as to the wants, prospects and conditions of the agricultural interests throughout the State; and at such annual meeting the several reports from the county societies shall be delivered to the president of the Indiana State Board of Agriculture; and the said president and delegates shall, at this meeting, elect suitable persons to fill all vacancies in the Indiana State Board of Agriculture.

"Sec. 7. And it shall be the duty of said Board to make an annual report to the General Assembly of the State, embracing the proceedings of the Board for the first year, and an abstract of the proceedings of the several county agricultural societies, as well as a general view of the condition of agriculture throughout the State, accompanied by such recommendations as they may deem interesting and useful.

"Sec. 8. That the sum of $1,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from the treasury for the use of the Board, and an account of the expenditures of the Board shall be included in the annual report of the Board of the General Assembly.

"Sec. 9. That the Indiana State Board of Agriculture shall have the power to hold state fairs at such times and places as they may deem proper and expedient and have the entire control of the same, fixing the amounts of the various premiums offered, embracing every article of science and art, or such portions of them as they may deem expedient and proper, calculated to advance the interest of the people of the State. They may employ assistants, receive contributions, donations, etc., and unite with a county or district society for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said state fairs."

The foregoing Act was passed under the Constitution of 1816, which contained the following provision:

"Sec. 1. Knowledge and learning, generally diffused through a community, being essential to the preservation of a free government, . . . the General Assembly shall, from time to time, pass such laws as shall be calculated to encourage intellectual, scientific and agricultural improvements, by allowing rewards and immunities for the promotion and improvement of arts, sciences, commerce, manufactures and natural history; and to countenance and encourage the principles of humanity, honesty, industry and morality." Art. 9, § 1.

The Constitution of 1816 contained no provision against creating private corporations by special Acts. In Angell & Ames on Corporations, at section 18, it is said: "The public benefit is deemed a sufficient consideration of a grant of corporate privileges; and hence, when a grant of such privileges is made (being in the nature of an executed contract) it cannot, in case of a private corporation, which involves private rights, be revoked. The object in creating a corporation is, in fact, to gain the union, contribution and assistance of several persons for the successful promotion of some design of general utility; though the corporation may at the same time be established for the advantage of those who are members of it. The principle is and has been so laid down by Domat that the design of a corporation is to provide for some good that is useful to the public. With respect to Acts of Incorporation, says one of the judges of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, "they ought never to be passed but in consideration of services to be rendered to the public."

In Section 14 the following statement is made: "The Bank of the United States, for example, if the stock belonged exclusively to the government, would be a public corporation; but inasmuch as there are others and private owners of the stock, it is a private corporation."

In section 31 it is said: "Private corporations are indisputably the creations of public policy; and, in the popular meaning of the term, may be called public; but yet, if the whole interest does not belong to the government (as if the corporation is created for the administration of civil or municipal power) the corporation is private."

In section 82 it is said: "Nor does it make any difference that the State has an interest as one of the corporators; for it does not by such participation identify itself with the corporation. Says Marshall, Ch. J., in U. S. v. Planters Bank, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 907, 6 L. ed. 244, 'the Planters' Bank of Georgia is not the State of Georgia, although the State holds an interest in it.'" In section 34 it is said: "A hospital founded by private benefaction, it has been held, is not thereby constituted a public corporation, controllable by the government; nor does it make any difference that the funds have been generally derived from the bounty of the government itself." See §§ 89, 40.

In 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. § 22, it is said: "Public and municipal corporations distinguished. Corporations intended to assist in the conduct of local civil government are sometimes styled political, sometimes public, sometimes civil and sometimes municipal; and certain kinds of them, with very restricted powers, quasi corporations. All these by way of distinction from private corporations."

Sec. 52: "A fundamental division of corporations heretofore adverted to is into public and private. The importance of this distinction cannot be too much emphasized; since upon it are based the legal principles which so broadly distinguish the two classes of corporations. With private corporations the present work has no other concern than to point out by way of illustration wherein they differ from those which are public. Both classes are alike created by Legislature, and in the same way, by special charter or under general Corporation Acts."

In section 58 it is said: "Private corporations are created for private as distinguished from purely public purposes; and they are not, in contemplation of law, public, because it may have been supposed by the Legislature that their establishment would promote, either directly or consequentially, the public interest. They cannot be compelled to accept a charter or incorporating statute; but when assented to the legislative grant is irrevocable, and it cannot, without the consent of the corporation, be impaired or destroyed by any subsequent Act of legislation, unless the right to do so was reserved at the time." Waterman, on the Law of Corporations, asserts the same doctrine. §§ 14, 16, 17.

In the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629, it is held that public corporations are such only as are founded by the government for public purposes where the whole interests belong to the government. In this case it is held that no authority exists in a government to regulate, control or change a corporation created by it; except when the corporation is, in the strict sense, a public one, and its franchises the exclusive property of the government itself. In such a case, the officers of the corporation would be public officers. The corporation in this case was created by a charter in which the trustees were mentioned by the name of the "Trustees of Dartmouth College," granting to them and their successors the usual corporate privileges and powers, and authorizing the trustees who are to govern the college to fill up all vacancies which may be created in their own body, and it was held to be a private corporation.

In the case of Vincennes University v. Indiana, 55 U. S. 14 How. 268, 14 L. ed. 416, it was held that the Acts of 1806 and 1807, establishing Vincennes University and incorporating the same by the name of the Board of Trustees of the Vincennes University, made it a private corporation over which the State could not exercise control. See Union Pac. R. Co. v. United States and Cent. Pac. R. Co. v. Gallatin, 99 U. S. 700, 718, 25 L. ed. 496, 504.

The State University was established by an Act which made provision for a board of trustees and enacted that they and their successors shall be a body politic, with the style of the Trustees of the Indiana University, in that name to sue and be sued, etc. In the case of State v. Carr, 111 Ind. 335, 9 West. Rep. 818, the court quoted from the case of Regents of the University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill & J. 365-368, with approval the following language: "A corporation may be private, and yet the act or charter contain provision of a purely public character, introduced solely for the public good. . . . A public corporation is one that is created for political purposes, with political powers, to be exercised for purposes connected with the public good in the administration of civil government; an instrument of the government, subject to the control of the Legislature and its members, officers of the government, for the administration and discharge of public duties; as in the cases of cities, towns," etc. The court further says that "the university was established under the direct authority of the State, through a special Act of the Legislature; or that the charter contains provisions of a purely public character; nor yet that the institution was merely established, and is and should be perpetually maintained, at the public expense, for the public good, does not make it a public corporation, or constitute its endowment fund a public fund." It is further said: "The legal status of the State University, being that of a technically private or at most a quasi public corporation, the university fund of which it is the sole beneficiary is therefore not a public fund within the meaning of the law."

These legal rules laid down by the authorities from which we have quoted and stated the law as declared, are supported and adhered to by innumerable decisions of courts of the highest standing, from which we might quote and extend this opinion to an unreasonable and unwarranted length; but we deem it unnecessary to do so. Under the rules stated, it is clear that the Indiana State Board of Agriculture is a private corporation; and it matters not to what extent the State has voluntarily aided it by contributions and appropriations. The corporation now owns a large amount of property. The main funds it has handled and used have been received from private citizens, railroad companies, the City of Indianapolis and funds received from state fairs held by the Board. The members of the Board have not been chosen by the State; they are not state officers. It has not been a state institution. It is true, there are no shares of stock issued and held by the trustees or private individuals; neither are shares of stock issued by colleges and universities or charitable institutions which are private corporations, and it is not necessary to make it a private corporation that shares of stock be issued. The act creating it made it a body corporate, with perpetual succession in the manner prescribed. It is, in a sense, an educational institution. It seeks to bring together people engaged in agricultural pursuits, as well as those engaged in manufacturing farm machinery and other articles adapted to use in the cultivation of the soil and harvesting of crops and other articles used by the public, as well as those engaged in raising stock, and to exhibit to those in attendance the crops resulting from the various methods of farming and the various machinery manufactured for the use of those engaged in agricultural pursuits, as well as the various brands of stock; and give to the people of the State, and particularly those engaged in agricultural pursuits, an opportunity of discussing various methods of farming and farm implements used and the different brands of stock raised, and to educate the people in this way in the pursuits of agriculture, and to educate and improve the condition of the agriculturist, that they may have a knowledge of the best methods of farming, best machinery to use and the best brands of stock. An agricultural society is defined in the Century Dictionary as "a society for promoting agricultural interests, such as the improvement of land, of implements, of the brands of cattle, etc." A new English dictionary defines an agriculturist as "a student of the science of agriculture."

The trustees so elected have no financial interest in the property of the corporation; that is to say, they are not the owners of the property of the corporation in such a sense as that they can sell it and appropriate the proceeds to their own use, any more than could the trustees of the State University sell and convert the proceeds of the property to their own use. They are simply trustees to manage and control it. The institution, the corporation, exists for the benefit of the people of the State, and the law would not allow its purpose to fail by a failure of those charged with the duty of electing the successors; but neither the State by its General Assembly nor the trustees of the corporation have any right to appropriate the property of the corporation to the use of the State or the individual members of the Board. The General Assembly of the State has recognized this Indiana State Board of Agriculture as a private corporation. By an Act of the Legislature in 1877, the State loaned to the corporation $35,000, and took a mortgage upon its property. Again, in 1881, by an Act of the Legislature, such lien for $25,000 was postponed and made a subsequent lien to a lien of a third party on the lands of said corporation. See, in addition to the authorities above cited, 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. §§ 1, 3, 4; New Glou- cester School Fund Trustees v. Bradbury, 11 Me. 124; Allen v. McKean, 1 Sumn. 297; State v. Vincennes University, 5 Ind. 78; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Bap. Church, 108 U. S. 880, 27 L. ed. 744; Yarmouth v. North Yarmouth, 84 Me. 417; People v. Morris, 18 Wend. 881; State Board of Agriculture v. Citizens St. R. Co. 47 Ind. 407.

The Act of 1891 attempts to take from the appellee all the property acquired by it. It both impairs the contract or charter of 1851, by which it made the appellee a private corporation, and it seeks to take its property from it without due process of law.

Having reached the conclusion that the appellee is a private corporation, it leads to an affirmation of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

George MCARTHUR, Committee, etc., of Ebenezer Larmouth, Resp.,

v.

Henry GORDON et al., Appts

(.....N. Y.....)

1. A declaration of trust made in consideration of a conveyance of land, although at a later date, is valid and irrevocable, and cannot be limited or affected by subsequent acts or contracts of the trustee with a stranger to the parties named in the instrument.
2. The support of an incompetent person who has always lived on a certain farm to which a vendee of the farm binds himself by a declaration of trust to apply the net rents of the farm or the interest on the purchase price if it should be sold, and which is made a first lien on the farm in case of a sale thereof, is not limited to support on the farm where there is nothing in the declaration to show that intent.

3. It is the duty of a trustee to exercise a supervision over the care and comfort of an incompetent person for whose support in consideration of the conveyance of a farm he has made a declaration of trust to appropriate the net rents of the farm or the interest on its price if sold; and he should apply the proceeds so far as necessary to that purpose wherever within reasonable limits such person may be cared for and supported.
4. The liability of a trustee who in consideration of a deed has charged property with a trust for the support of an incompetent person cannot be avoided by transferring the property charged with such support, but he is liable for such part of the expense thereof if not furnished by his grantee as cannot be recovered from the land itself or from the second grantee.

(Earl, J., dissent.)

NOTE.—Creation or declaration of trust.

Any agreement or contract in writing, whereby a person agrees that a particular parcel of land shall be dealt with in a particular manner for the benefit of another, raises a trust in favor of such other person. *Conway v. (June 2, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, modifying and affirming a judgment of the Washington County Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce compliance with the terms of a declaration of trust alleged to have been made by defendant Gordon for the support of Larmouth. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Westfall & Whitcomb, for appellants:

It is not pretended that the agreement claimed to have been made between Miss McDoual and Gordon, as the consideration of the deed from her to him, was in writing. And such agreement, if clearly and conclusively proved to have been made by parol, would be void and not enforceable by action at law or in equity.

Wheeler v. Reynolds, 66 N. Y. 227; Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156; Hutchins v. Hutchins, 98 N. Y. 57; Ros v. Barker, 82 N. Y. 432; Levy v. Brush, 45 N. Y. 589; Sturtevant v. Sturtevant, 20 N. Y. 89; Wilson v. Deen, 74 N. Y. 581; Bighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288.

The paper executed by Gordon and recorded April, 1876, neither creates, declares, establishes nor proves the trust relied upon by the plaintiff to maintain this action.

Cook v. Barr, supra; Hubbard v. Sharp, Nov. 1887; 1 Hilliard, Real Prop. 4th ed. 425; 1 Greenl. Cruise, Real Prop. 356; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 268.

If the instrument in question is sufficient in form and substance to constitute a declaration of trust, it never became operative, because it never had an inception, and especially because the beneficiary, at all times until at or just before the commencement of this action, repudiated it and sought to cancel and destroy it.

Until refusal to support at the place designated, there is no right of action.

Bennett v. Akin, 88 Hun, 251; Pool v. Pool, 1 Hill, 580.

The transactions between Gordon and Davis furnish no cause of action against Davis in favor of Larmouth.

The recording by Gordon of the paper claimed by plaintiff to be a "declaration of trust" did not operate as notice to Davis, a subsequent purchaser, and there is no proof that he had actual notice thereof.

*A decision was reached in this case and an opinion handed down reversing the judgment of the lower court, on January 27, 1891. A rehearing was subsequently granted, after which the opinion given herewith was handed down, which supersedes the former one and renders the printing of it unnecessary. [Rep.]

Larmouth was a stranger so far as the agreements between Gordon and Davis were concerned. And "a mere stranger cannot intervene and claim by action the benefit of a contract between other parties."

On re-argument.

The instrument executed by the defendant Gordon, considered as a declaration of trust, does not entitle Larmouth to "support" elsewhere than on the premises referred to in the instrument, so long as it is not refused him there.

Plaintiff's and Larmouth's non-acceptance and repudiation constitute a waiver and a perfect defense.

Mr. Matthew Hale, with Mr. Job G. Sherman, for respondent:

The court was right in holding that the instrument executed and placed upon record by the defendant Gordon was a valid and binding declaration of trust, relating back to the date of the deed from Ellis McDoual to him.

The recording of the declaration of trust was constructive notice thereof to all subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers. It is a "conveyance" within the meaning of the Statute.

On re-argument.

The obligation of defendants under the instrument executed by the defendant Gordon April 19, 1876, was not limited to the support of Larmouth upon the farm in question.

28 Cent. L. J. 816.

The office of trustee cannot be delegated. If a trustee confides his duties or the trust fund to the care of a stranger, he will be personally responsible.

1 Perry, Tr. § 402; Adams v. Olifton, 1 Russ. 297; Hardwick v. Mynd, 1 Anstr. 109.

A transfer of a trust fund by a trustee to another is of itself a breach of trust, and renders the assigning trustee responsible for the acts of his assignee.

Hulme v. Hulme, 2 Myl. & K. 682; Flanders v. Lamphear, 9 N. H. 201.

The refusal of defendant Gordon to do anything for Larmouth, accompanied by his statement "that he had got all through with it," excused plaintiff from making any further demand.

The trust being perfectly created, nothing is required of the court but to give effect to the trust as an executed trust; and it will be carried into effect, although without consideration, to the same extent and in the same manner as if there had been a valuable consideration for the creation of the trust.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought on behalf of Ebenezer Larmouth, a lunatic, against the defendant Gordon and his grantee, upon a declaration of trust executed by Gordon for the benefit of said Larmouth, to enforce the trust, and recover the rents and profits of the trust property claimed to have been misappropriated by the defendants. The complaint proceeded upon the theory that the defendants had neglected to execute the duties of the trust, and had appropriated to their own use the income of the trust property, instead of applying it to the maintenance and support of its beneficiary, as provided by the trust. This case has been the occasion of some difference of opinion in the court as to the proper construction to be given to the declaration of trust, and now comes before us upon a re-argument. This disagreement has arisen as much, I think, from the divergent views taken of the facts by the various members of the court as from any difference between us as to the rules of law applicable to them. A more elaborate statement of the leading facts, as they appear from the findings of the trial court, as well as from the undisputed evidence, will tend more, I think, to dissipate misconception and harmonize our views than any other mode of treating the case. Stated in their chronological order, they are as follows:

In the year 1876 one Ellis McDoual, an unmarried woman of the age of ninety years, owned and resided upon a farm of about 45 acres in the Town of Jackson, Washington County, having no other property of any material value. Her only son, then of the age of about sixty-six years, a harmless lunatic, resided with her, and had so lived with her on the farm for many years. The farm was worth about $8,000, and its annual rental value, exclusive of taxes, was about $175. In the year 1873 Miss McDoual executed a will by which she devised all her property, both real and personal, in trust to her executors to receive the rents and profits thereof, and apply them to the use of her son, Ebenezer Larmouth, during his natural life, with remainder to her pastor and friend, the Rev. Henry Gordon. On October 16, 1874, Miss McDoual executed and delivered to Gordon a warranty deed of such premises for the consideration, expressed in the deed, "of one dollar and other valuable consideration to her duly paid," which deed was duly recorded October 22, 1874, in the clerk's office of Washington County. Miss McDoual died March 8, 1876, having lived upon and retained possession of the farm until that time, and leaving her son in possession thereof. On April 19, 1876, Gordon executed an instrument in writing, which he caused to be recorded in the clerk's office of Washington County, reading as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that because of certain real estate duly conveyed to me by Ellis McDoual, late of the Town of Jackson, Washington County, New York, I, Henry Gordon, of Coila, Washington County, New York, do, of my own free will and accord, hereby consider myself, heirs, executors or administrators, holden and firmly bound to appropriate or cause to be appropriated, for the comfortable support of Ebenezer Larmouth during his life, all the rents, after deducting necessary expenses, of said real estate, or, if said real estate should be sold, the proper maintenance in board and clothing should be first lien upon said real estate during the life of said Ebenezer Larmouth. The subscriber to this bond distinctly asserts that its obligations on him are limited to the rents of said real estate, or to the interest on the purchase money, should said real estate be sold. Signed with my hand and seal this 19th day of April, 1876. Henry Gordon. [L. s.] Miss McDoual never owned or conveyed to Henry Gordon any other real estate than this farm. Gordon preached Miss McDoual's funeral sermon, immediately after her death, and, referring to her son, stated "that ample means have been provided for his support and welfare," and concluded by saying "The friends may rest assured that her wishes will be faithfully carried out." The first year after Miss Doual's death the executor of her will took possession of the farm, and rented it to one Green for $150 a year. During this time Larmouth occupied the house on the farm alone, and was boarded by Green, who was allowed 20c. a week therefor, to be applied upon the rent of the land. No special complaint is made by the plaintiff but that the income of the farm was for this year substantially applied to the support of Larmouth. In January, 1877, Henry Gordon executed and delivered to one Robert Davis a warranty deed of the farm for the consideration of $400, which was secured by a mortgage upon the farm; and upon the condition also that Davis "would provide and furnish Ebenezer Larmouth," during his natural life, "suitable clothing, food, lodging and necessary medical attendance and medicine," which Davis thereby covenanted to provide. It was further provided by this deed that "the support and maintenance of the said Larmouth, as aforesaid, shall constitute and remain an indefeasible lien upon the premises hereby conveyed, during the natural life of said Larmouth." Immediately after this conveyance the defendant Davis leased about an acre and a quarter of the land, with the buildings on the premises, to one Plunkitt, in consideration that Plunkitt should board Larmouth, and do his washing and mending, "if the said Larmouth would consent to stay on the farm with Plunkitt, and, in case he did not, that Plunkitt should pay $40 a year for the privileges enjoyed by him." Davis occupied and cultivated the remainder of the premises, and received payment of the rent agreed to be paid by Plunkitt, Larmouth having refused to live in Plunkitt's family. Plunkitt was assisted in taking possession of the house by Davis, his servants, and the executor of Miss McDoual's will, and met with some opposition from Larmouth, who forbade them from coming upon the premises, and claimed to own the farm and the property in the house, and asserted that they were attempting to rob him of his patrimony. Larmouth's bed and furniture were then forcibly taken from the room which he was accustomed to occupy, and packed away in another part of the house, and he refused to remain and live with Plunkitt. It appears that Larmouth was a Presbyterian, of Scottish descent, and Plunkitt an Irish Catholic, with a family consisting of a wife and three children; and Larmouth being asked to stay with Plunkitt, said he didn't want to live with an Irishman. He had been subjected to a personal assault at the hands of a servant of Davis on the premises previously. Larmouth then left the house with McArthur, and has ever since continued to make it his home at McArthur's, and has lived with and been practically supported by him. He has during all this time, up to the trial, been irrational, poor, needy and dependent, and frequently sick and practically unable to support or take care of himself. He has never received any attention or support from either Gordon or Davis, and all applications to them for aid have been uniformly neglected or evaded. Applications have been frequently made to them for assistance, and the payment of bills for medical attendance and other necessities, but they were met by Gordon, after he sold to Davis, with the declaration "that he had got through with it," and by Davis with a refusal to pay for anything he did not himself order. Plunkitt remained in possession of the property rented by him for two years, after which Davis moved into the house and occupied it, with the farm, and has continued to do so, and to receive the rents and profits thereof, to the time of the trial. Davis has never paid anything for the property, except the sum of $34 annually to Gordon as interest upon the bond and mortgage, which sum Gordon has appropriated to his own use.

There are certain propositions involved in this controversy concerning which there is no difference of opinion in the court, and among them are the following: first, that the declaration of April 19, 1876, constituted a valid and enforceable trust, and imposed upon its creator the obligations and duties of a trustee, to be discharged in accordance with the meaning and effect of the language used therein by him; second, that, in giving a construction to such instrument, regard may be had to the situation of the parties, and the surrounding circumstances, as well as the language of the instrument, for the purpose of arriving at the intent of the author in making it, where that intent is not clearly expressed; third, that this trust was irrevocable, and cannot be limited or affected by any subsequent acts or contracts of the trustee with a stranger to the parties named in the instrument; fourth, that, so far as any interest in the real estate is concerned, the rights and liabilities of Gordon and Davis, after the purchase by Davis, were co-extensive, Davis having purchased, not only with constructive as well as actual notice of the liabilities imposed upon the land by the terms of the trust, but also under a positive condition that he should hold the title subject to the obligation of discharging the duties imposed by its provisions upon the trustee; fifth, that Gordon did not, by contracting with a third party to discharge his obligations to Larmouth, relieve himself from the duty of seeing that such obligations were performed; sixth, that it is quite immaterial, so far as the liabilities of Gordon and Davis to the beneficiary of the trust are concerned, what the nature of the subsequent contract between Gordon and Davis was, and whether the same should be reformed or not.

Assuming the correctness of these propositions, there are left for consideration the following questions: first, whether the provisions in the declaration of trust, relating to Larmouth's support and maintenance, are limited to support to be furnished on the premises therein referred to, or constitute a general obligation to appropriate the rents and profits of the trust property to his support wherever it might be needed: second, whether an active duty on the part of Gordon was incurred, by the obligations of the trust, to exercise care and supervision over the person and wants of the beneficiary, and to provide for them to the extent of such rents and profits wherever such care and supervision might be necessary and reasonable: third, what is the measure of the liability incurred by Gordon, and how far has he made himself responsible by his neglect to appropriate the income of the trust property to the support of Larmouth.

It seems to be well established by the authorities that, under a general obligation to maintain and support another, where no place is specified, the beneficiary may, as a general rule, live wherever he chooses, provided his choice does not involve needless expenses. Wilder v. Whittemore, 15 Mass. 262; Stillwell v. Pease, 4 N. J. Eq. 74; Proctor v. Proctor, 141 Mass. 165, 2 New Eng. Rep. 838; Conkey v. Everett, 11 Gray, 95; Pettie v. Case, 2 Allen, 546; Rowell v. Jewett, 69 Me. 298. This rule is, undoubtedly, subject to exceptions in cases where there is great inadequacy of consideration, or family arrangements are made involving the support of some of its members by others who have been accustomed to live together, or the circumstances of the case, and the language of the instrument indicate an intention that support shall be furnished in a particular manner, at a particular place, or by particular persons. In such cases the courts have sometimes construed similar contracts as meaning that support could be required only at the place or by the persons indicated, even though that was not made an express requirement of the agreement. Such were the cases of McKillop v. McKillop, 8 Barb. 552; Pool v. Pool, 1 Hill, 560, and others of like character. We have, however, been unable to find, among the numerous cases referred to, any which are at all applicable to the circumstances of this particular case. Whether we regard the language of the instrument, or the circumstances surrounding the parties, we find nothing which constitutes this case an exception to the general rule. The trust deed unconditionally devotes the net rents of the trust property to the support of the beneficiary, so far as they are necessary for that purpose, without reference to his place of abode, and implies that the trustee shall collect and appropriate them, from time to time, as they are needed by the beneficiary. There is nothing in the circumstances of the parties indicating an intention to limit the requirements of the beneficiary to a living upon the trust property. The creator of the trust evidently had no intention of making Larmouth a member of his family. He was, apparently, an aged clergyman, living at a distance from his benefactress, and was unadapted, by occupation, character and pursuits from receiving an uninviting and irrational person into his family, or of exercising personal supervision over the life, manners and occupation of such a person. He was in no wise related to his benefactress or her son, and had no apparent intention of changing his mode of life, or engaging in the unaccustomed business of farming at a distance from the field of his accustomed labors. He certainly manifested no intention of permitting any member of Larmouth's family to live on the premises, and he had not then determined to farm out his support to strangers who were offensive or otherwise to his religious and social feelings. No one was then living on the farm, and none, therefore, who could receive and take care of Larmouth at that place, and it is obvious that the trustee had not then any person or family in view who could have had any interest in supporting him on the farm. The beneficiary, while not violent or dangerous, was unmanageable and insensible to the dictates of reason or propriety, and could be managed or controlled only by persuasion or force. It was at all times conjectural whether he would be satisfied with any provision, whether reasonable or not, which should be made for him, and in case he was not, it was obvious that other means would have to be adopted by the author of the trust in order to make its object and purpose effective. When the trust was declared, it is apparent that Gordon had no settled plan as to the disposition he intended to make of the property, or the mode in which the duties of the trust were to be discharged. By the deed of trust he devoted all the rents of the farm, unconditionally, to the support of Larmouth, so far as they should be necessary, and, in case he sold the farm, he provided that the interest on the purchase price should be the limit of his liability under the trust deed. These amounts were capable of definite ascertainment, and were not subject to the uncertainty which would attend an obligation to support and maintain alone. It must then have appeared to Gordon a matter of comparative indifference whether these rents or interest should be expended upon the farm, or were paid to those who would apply them to the support of Larmouth. Indeed, the language of the trust furnishes irrefutable evidence that Gordon contemplated the sale of the property, and the application of the interest money derived from the purchase price to the support of Larmouth, wherever he might be; and it furnishes no answer to this view that the obligations of the trust were made a lien upon the farm. It was not till a year later that Gordon concluded to realize his interest in the farm, and he then considered it worth about one seventh of the value of the property, leaving at least six sevenths to accomplish the purposes of the trust. The theory that, under the terms of the trust deed, Larmouth would be obligated to take his support upon the trust property, seems to have been an afterthought, as it was neither expressed in the trust deed, claimed on the trial, presented by finding or exception, nor raised in the points of defendant's counsel in this court, until the re-argument of the case. The main drift of the defendant's contention, heretofore, has been that, under the terms of the deed from Gordon to Davis, if reformed as Davis desired it should be, he could not be held liable to furnish support, except upon the property purchased. We are therefore of the opinion that the trust deed constituted the rents and profits of the farm, or the interest upon its purchase price, a trust fund for the support of Larmouth; and that it was the duty of the trustee thereunder to exercise a supervision over his care and comfort, and apply such proceeds to his use, so far as they were necessary, wherever he might, within reasonable limits, be cared for and supported. These duties were assumed for an ample consideration by Davis upon his purchase, and, as between Gordon and Davis, he became primarily liable to discharge them. It is obvious, from the undisputed evidence in the case, that both Davis and Gordon have been grossly derelict and blamable in the performance of their duties. The series of proceedings by which substituted performances of the duties of the trust were attempted to be made, which culminated in the obligation of Plunkitt to devote $40 a year to that purpose, illustrate the indifferent and improvident manner in which this trust has been neglected by the trustee. No consideration whatever seems to have been given to the wishes of Larmouth, or regard manifested for his welfare, health or comfort, but an unconscientious struggle was entered upon by the substituted agencies to find the minimum sum to which the obligations of the trust might be reduced. Gordon thought the rents and profits of about six sevenths of the farm were sufficient for the purpose, but Davis was of the opinion that less than a quarter of the amount was necessary, and Plunkitt undertook to make a profit even at that price. Larmouth was thus turned over to strangers, whose only interest in him was to see how cheaply he could be made to live, or if his living could not be made so disagreeable that he would abandon all claims to support from the defendant. We are of the opinion that even if the obligations of the trust had required Larmouth to take his support upon the farm, no adequate or sufficient provision was then made for him; and much more was this the case if he had the right to live elsewhere, as no provision whatever was made for such a contingency.

Having reached the conclusion that the duties of the trust have been wholly neglected by those charged with their performance, it follows that they are liable in this action for such damages as have been incurred by Larmouth on account of their default, to the extent of the rents and profits of the land, or the sum which, with reasonable care and prudence in its management, it would have yielded from the time the trustee took possession, in March, 1887. Such damages could not, however, have been extended beyond the sum which was required for the reasonable and comfortable support of the beneficiary; but, to this extent, they were applicable, even if it required the whole of such rents and profits. The evidence on the subject of the amount required for the support of Larmouth is somewhat indefinite, and the trial court made no finding on the subject. There is evidence furnished by the testimony of the principal parties to the action which shows a practical agreement as to the sum which ought to be paid for the purposes of the trust. Davis expressly swears that he was willing and offered to pay the sum of $100 annually to the relatives of Larmouth and the plaintiff, although denying that such offer had been made, leaves his evidence open to the inference that if he had understood the offer to have been made he would certainly have accepted it. William Larmouth, a relative and representative of Larmouth, testifies that he had a conversation with Davis in which he asked him to pay a hundred dollars a year for Larmouth's support, but Davis refused to do so. We think there was a substantial agreement between the interested parties that $100 a year was deemed a satisfactory sum to pay towards Larmouth's maintenance. In view of the desire of the parties, manifested on the argument, that a final judgment should be made in the case, we have concluded to give effect to the apparent concurrence of the parties on the trial as to the amount which should be paid for the annual support of Larmouth. It is certainly desirable that a controversy which has extended over a long period of time should be ended, and some relief should be afforded to the helpless and indigent beneficiary before his death, which, in the ordinary course of nature, must soon occur, if this can be consistently done. We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be modified so as to provide for the payment of $100 a year, with interest on such annual payments, with costs of the action to plaintiff in all the courts, the payments to commence with March 6, 1878; that these sums, having, by the trust, been made a lien upon the land, should be primarily charged upon it, and, in case there should be a deficiency on the sale thereof to meet the charges, such deficiency should be adjudged to be paid by the defendant Robert Davis, and in case of his inability to pay it, then upon the defendant Gordon.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

George C. MILLS *et al.*v.
UNITED STATES.

(....Fed. Rep.....)

1. Damage to rice fields by the construction of a dam in harbor improvements, thus raising the low-water level in a navigable river and destroying the drainage of the fields and increasing their liability to overflow in time of freshets, does not constitute a taking of the property within the meaning of the constitutional provision for compensation. The rights of riparian owners are subordinate to the power of the government to control and improve navigation.

2. A claim against the United States for consequential damages to rice fields by the construction of a dam in making harbor improvements is one sounding in tort, and is not within the jurisdiction of the circuit court.

ACTION to recover compensation for injuries to plaintiffs' land by reason of the construction of a dam by defendant in a navigable river in making harbor improvements. On demurrer to the complaint. Case dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Tried before Pardee and Spear, JJ.

Mr. Marion Erwin, U. S. Atty., for defendant, in support of the demurrer:

NOTE.—Rights of navigation and commerce paramount.

The rights of navigation and commerce are always paramount to those of public fisheries. Stockton v. Baltimore & N. Y. R. Co. 1 Intera. Com. Rep. 411. See note to Wright v. Mulvaney (Wis.) 9 L. R. A. 807.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce comprehends the control, for that purpose, and to the extent necessary, of all the navigable waters of the United States which are accessible from any other State than those in which they lie (Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 718, 18 L. ed. 96), or which may be in any manner connected with commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with the Indian tribes. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23. See Cardwell v. American River Bridge Co. 118 U. S. 308, 28 L. ed. 960; Morgan Steamship Co. v. Louisiana Board of Health, 118 U. S. 465, 30 L. ed. 242.

But navigation upon a sound, as Currituck Sound, entirely within a State, is inland navigation, and where it is not connected with other waters leading to the sea it is not navigable under the laws of the United States. Woodhouse v. Cain, 55 N. C. 113.

The laws of a State granting to certain persons the exclusive right of navigation, by means of fire and steam, on all the waters of the State, are repugnant to the commercial clause of the United States Constitution. Gibbons v. Ogden, supra.

The public have a right of way for the purposes of navigation, which includes all that is reasonably necessary for that purpose. Pursell v. Stover, 110 Pa. 43.

This right exists between high and low water mark on a navigable stream, and includes the rights to tie a float of logs to a tree standing between 19 L. R. A.

This action sounds in tort.

In general only the injuries to the land through which the works are constructed are included in the assessment of damages.

Gould, Waters, § 252.

An action to redress these alleged injuries, if the suit were between individuals, would necessarily be in form ex delicto.

State sovereignty over inland navigable rivers.

State sovereignty over navigable rivers exclusively within their borders has never been surrendered to the general government. See note to Swanson v. Mississippi & Rum River Boom Co. (Minn.) 7 L. R. A. 674.

When the Revolution took place, the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character held the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soil under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government. *Martin v. #### Admission of new States.

The first clause of section 3 of art. 4 of the Federal Constitution, in relation to the admission of new States into the Union, refers to States to be formed out of territory to be acquired as well as that already ceded. Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. 19 How. 612, 15 L. ed. 786.

Congress is vested with the sole power of admitting new States into the Union. Brittle v. People, 2 Neb. 198.

On the admission of a new State it at once becomes entitled to and possessed of all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to the original States. Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 212, 11 L. ed. 565; Permoli v. First Municipality of New Orleans, 44 U. S. 8 How. 559, 11 L. ed. 739; Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S. 678, 27 L. ed. 442; *Cardwell v. When a new State was admitted into the Union from the Northwest Territory the Ordinance of 1787 ceased to have any operative force in limiting its powers of legislation as compared with those possessed by the original States. On the admission of such new State it at once became entitled to and possessed all the rights of dominion and sovereignty which belonged to them. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 135 U. S. 9, 31 L. ed. 683, citing Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 8 How. 230, 11 L. ed. 578; Permoli v. First Municipality of New Orleans, Escanaba & L. M. Transp. Co. v. Chicago, Cardwell v. American River Bridge Co. and Huse v. Glover, supra.

The clause in the Admission Act of a new State prohibiting physical obstructions and impediments in navigable waters without the consent of Congress prohibits only the imposition of duties for the use of the navigation, and any discrimination denying to citizens of other States the equal right to such use in no way affects the right of the States to authorize the erection of bridges, dams, etc., in and upon the navigable waters wholly within their limits. *Pound v. When a city is made a port of entry, Congress does not thereby assume to detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each State over its own public rivers, including the power to make 12 L. R. A.

The petition avers that the plaintiffs owned rice plantations on Hutchinson's Island in the Savannah River and on the mainland opposite. These lands have been prepared at large expense for the purpose of rice cultivation, and have their chief value because of that fact. It is essential to the cultivation of rice on such plantations that there shall be a system of canals both for flooding and draining the rice fields. The lands in question were drained into the front river, that is the river proper, prior to the acts on the part of the government complained of. The bottoms of the plaintiffs' ditches and the sills of the trunks and flood-gates were above low-water mark, and their system of drainage was complete, and it is complained that the erection by the government of what is called the cross-tides dam, running from the upper end of Hutchinson's Island to the lower end of Argyle Island, cuts off all the flow of water from the stream connecting front and back rivers, has raised both the high and low water levels in front river, and has not only destroyed the facilities for draining these lands into front river, but has rendered it necessary to raise the levees around the rice fields to prevent flooding the fields at high water. This it is alleged has unfitted the lands for the purpose of rice culture, and makes it necessary that new drainage into back river must be provided where the water levels are suitable. The expense of doing this will amount to $10,000, and plaintiffs insist that they are thus damaged to that extent. This cross-tides dam was erected by the United States as a part of a system of harbor improvements with the full bridges over them. (Decision of circuit court affirmed on equal division.) Milnor v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. (U. S.) 16 L. ed. 799.

Right of eminent domain.

"All the property in a State is derived from or protected by its government, and hence it is held subject to its wants in taxation, and to certain important public uses both in war and in peace." Vattel, Law of Nations, § 244; 2 Kent, Com. 270; 1 Bl. Com. 139.

Some ground this public right on sovereignty (2 Kent, Com. 339; Grotius, bk. 1, chap. 1, § 6), some on necessity, and for useful purposes (Grotius, bk. 3, chap. 14, § 7; Puffendorf, Law of Nations, bk. 3, chap. 5, § 7; Bynkershoek, Law of War, bk. 2, chap. 15. And see note to Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 163, 1 L. ed. 333; West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 47 U. S. 6 How. 539, 13 L. ed. 543; some on implied contract. Bogert v. United States, 2 Ct. Cl. 164.

To render the exercise of the legislative power to take or injure private property valid, a fair compensation must in all cases be previously made. See note to Barre R. Co. v. Montpelier & White River R. Co. (Vt.) 4 L. R. A. 735.

Private property, however, is not "damaged for public purposes" by a public improvement within a constitutional provision requiring compensation for such damages where no invasion is made of any right or use of such property; in such case it is damnum absque injuria. See note to Peel v. Atlanta (Ga.) 3 L. R. A. 737.

Power of general government in exercise of the right.

The right of eminent domain over the shores knowledge of the fact that the drainage of plaintiffs' land would be thus impaired and destroyed. The case of the plaintiffs depends upon the following propositions:

1. The action of the government officials in erecting the cross-tides dam amounts to a taking of their property for public use without just compensation.

2. The right of drainage into the river is appurtenant to the land, and has been taken in the same manner.

3. The government by taking this property entered into an implied contract for the compensation of complainants.

4. Their right to this compensation is a claim arising under the Constitution of the United States; and—

5. Also under an Act of Congress, to wit, the Act authorizing harbor improvements.

The defendant demurred to the petition upon the grounds (1) that the plaintiffs have not set forth a cause of action against the government; (2) in so far as it is set forth it is an action ex delicto, and of actions sounding in tort against the government the court has no jurisdiction.

There are other grounds, but the decision must depend, in our opinion, upon the grounds stated.

The material clause of the Act of Congress under which it is sought to maintain this suit confers jurisdiction on the court of claims to try:

1. All claims against the United States founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress except for pensions, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, expressed or implied, with the government of the United States, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which claims the party would be entitled to redress against the United States either in a court of law, equity or admiralty if the United States were suable; provided, however, that nothing in this section shall be construed as giving to either of the courts herein mentioned jurisdiction to hear and determine claims growing out of the late civil war and commonly known as war-claims, or to hear and determine other claims which have heretofore been rejected or reported adversely by any court, department or commission authorized to hear and determine the same.

2. That the district courts of the United States shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the court of claims as to all matters named in the preceding section where the amount of claims does not exceed $1,000, and the circuit court of the United States shall have such concurrent jurisdiction in all cases where the amount of such claim exceeds $1,000, and does not exceed $10,000. All causes brought and tried under the provision of this Act shall be tried by the court without a jury. 43 Stat. at L. p. 505.

It appears from these provisions of the Statutes that the government has, with somewhat unusual magnanimity, opened the portals of its courts to a very large class of litigants having claims against it. It is equally observable that certain marked and distinct limitations upon this enlargement of the jurisdiction of the courts were defined. It will be obvious also that it was not the purpose of this legislation to create new causes of action, but merely to provide a convenient form for the adjudication of certain specified controversies.

The first and the more important inquiry presented by the demurrer is this: The jurisdiction being granted, do the facts set out in their entirety constitute a cause of action between plaintiffs and the government?

The entire declaration, with the bill of particulars, must be considered in order to determine this question,—otherwise a very partial and indeed imperfect view of the claim might and the soil under navigable waters for all municipal purposes belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdiction, and they only have the constitutional power to exercise it; but this power can never be so used as to affect the exercise of any national right of eminent domain or jurisdiction with which the United States has been invested by Congress, as over the navigable waters. There must be a direct statute of the United States in order to bring within the scope of its 12 L. R. A.

laws, as administered by the courts of law and equity, obstructions and nuisances in navigable streams within the State, such obstructions being offenses against the States. For illustrations, see Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co. 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412; Pollard v. Hagan, 44 U. S. 3 How. 229, 11 L. ed. 573; Milnor v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. (U. Congress is not deemed to have assumed police power over a navigable river in consequence of expenditures in improving its navigation. Willamette Iron Bridge Co. v. Hatch, 125 U. S. 1, 31 L. ed. 629, 7 Sawy. 127, 9 Sawy. 643.

A state statute authorizing a dam which stops the navigation of a navigable creek up which the tide flows for some distance, for the purpose of excluding the water from a marsh, to enhance the value of property adjoining, and to improve the health of the inhabitants, is not unconstitutional in the absence of any Act of Congress upon the subject. Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co. 37 U. S. 2 Pet. 245, 7 L. ed. 412.

be formed. The question is of importance in contemplation of the extensive and generous appropriations annually made by the national Legislature for the improvement of navigation, and thus for the general advancement and development of the interests of the entire country, and when we consider also the great volume of litigation which may depend upon the decision of cognate questions. It is insisted by the plaintiffs that the action of the government constitutes a taking of their property without just compensation, in violation of the 5th Amendment of the Constitution, which provides: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

What is a taking of private property for public use, in the meaning of this provision of the Constitution?

In the case of Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 640, 25 L. ed. 837, decision by Mr. Justice Strong, for the court, a statement of the law fundamental to this inquiry will be found. In that case the action was to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs in consequence of the action of the city authorities, in constructing a tunnel or passageway under La Salle Street, and under Chicago River where it crosses that street. The plaintiffs were the lessees of a lot, bounded on the east by the street and on the south by the river, and the injury of which they complained was that by the operations of the city they were deprived of access to their premises, both on the side of the river and of the street, during the prosecution of the work. It is true, in that case it was not claimed that the obstruction was a permanent one, and it appeared, as in the case now before the court, that there were no averments that the works were unnecessary. They were indeed indispensable for the construction of the tunnel. Also, as in this case, it was argued that the erection of the coffer dam was not only a public nuisance, but caused special damage to the plaintiff for which the right of action was maintainable. The argument was met by the following observations by the court: "That cannot be a nuisance, such as to give a common-law right of action, which the law authorizes. A Legislature may, and often does, authorize and even direct acts to be done which are harmful to individuals, and which without its authority would be nuisances; but in such a case, if the Statute be such as the Legislature has power to pass, the acts are lawful, and are not nuisances, unless the power has been exceeded. In such grants of power, a right to compensation for consequential injuries caused by the authorized erections may be given to those who suffer; but then the right is a creature of the Statute. It has no existence without it." It was there insisted that, though the city had the legal right to construct the tunnel, and to do what was necessary for its construction, subject to the condition that in doing the work there should be no unnecessary interference with private property, yet it was liable to make compensation for the consequential damage to persons specially injured. To this proposition the court withheld its assent.

The learned justice adds "that acts done in the proper exercise of governmental powers, and not directly encroaching upon private property, though their consequences may impair its use, are universally held not to be a taking within the meaning of the constitutional provision. They do not entitle the owner of such property to compensation from the State or its agents, or give him any right of action. This is supported by an immense weight of authority." "The extreme qualification of the doctrine," continues Justice Strong, "is to be found, perhaps, in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. C. Co., 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557, and in Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co., 51 N. H. 504. In those cases it was held that permanent flooding of private property may be regarded as a taking. In

Title to soil under navigable waters.

The State holds the title to the soil in navigable waters to low-water mark in trust for the people, and chiefly for the protection of the right of navigation. See note to Miller v. Mendenhall (Minn.) 8 L. R. A. 89; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, 8 L. R. A. 559, 58 Ark. 814.

Under the Riparian Laws of New Jersey, the lands below high-water mark constituting the shores and submerged lands of the navigable waters of the State were the property of the State as sovereign. Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 124 U. S. 656, 81 L. ed. 543.

So the title to lands covered by rivers which are navigable in fact is in the State, whether the tide ebbs and flows in them or not. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ramsey, supra; Fulmer v. Williams, 1 L. R. A. 603, 122 Pa. 191.

The beds of navigable rivers between the lines of ordinary low water on their opposite sides belong to the State, to be held and controlled by and for the public. Fulmer v. Williams, supra; Pursell v. Stover, 110 Pa. 43; Hobson v. Monteth, 15 Or. 251.

The public easement of access to navigable waters is distinct in its essential qualities from the title of the State in lands under tide-waters. The former inheres in the State in its sovereign capacity, the latter is strictly proprietary; and a grant or the proprietary title will not release or extinguish the 13 L. R. A.

sovereign right not necessarily included within the scope of the grant. State v. Haight, 36 N. J. L. 471.

All navigable waters within the territorial limits of the State and the soil under them belong in actual propriety to the public; the riparian owner by the common law has no peculiar rights therein as incidents of the estate and the privileges he possesses by the local custom, or by force of the Wharf Act, to acquire such rights, can, before possession has been taken, be regulated or revoked at the will of the Legislature. Stevens v. Paterson, & N. B. Co. 34 N. J. L. 532.

In Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 384, the court held that the owner of land bounded by a navigable river has certain riparian rights, such as free access, the right to make a landing, wharf or pier for his own use or for the use of the public. Harlan & H. Co. v. Paschall, 5 Del. Ch. 456.

At the time of the platting of Astoria, in 1847, the title of the land lying between high and low water mark upon the Columbia River was in the State; it could not be conveyed by a riparian owner. Hobson v. Monteth, 15 Or. 251.

Riparian rights of owners bounding on navigable streams, rule in various States. See note to Parker v. West Coast Packing Co. (Or.) 5 L. R. A. 61; Fulmer v. Williams (Pa.) 1 L. R. A. 603; Hanford v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 7 L. R. A. 722.

these cases there was a physical invasion of the real estate of the private owners and a practical ouster of his possession."

In the case of Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. O. Co., supra, to which the reference above quoted is made, the plaintiffs' demand for damages was based upon the following averments:

The defendants had erected a dam across Fox River, the northern outlet of Lake Winnebago, by which the waters of the lake were raised so high as to forcibly and with violence overflow the plaintiff's land, from the time of the completion of the dam in 1861 to the commencement of this suit, the water coming in with such violence as to tear up his trees and grass by the roots and wash them, with his hay by tons, away, to choke up his drains and fill up his ditches, to saturate some of his lands with water, and to dirty and injure other parts by bringing and leaving on them deposits of sand, and otherwise greatly injuring them.

It is to be observed, also, that the waters of Lake Winnebago were raised so high as to forcibly and with violence overflow all the lands of the plaintiff from the time of the completion of the dam in 1861 until the commencement of the suit in 1867. It was insisted by the defendants that they had erected a dam in accordance with the Act of Congress, and that the lands in question had not been taken or appropriated. Upon this contention, Mr. Justice Miller, in rendering the decision on appeal, announced: "We are of the opinion that the Statutes did not authorize the erection of a dam which would raise the water of the lake above the ordinary level," thus indicating, as will presently appear, a controlling distinction from the facts before the court here.

With reference to the contention of the defendants that there was no taking of the plaintiff's land within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and that the damage was a consequential result of such use of a navigable stream as the government had a right to make for the improvement of its navigation, Justice Miller further observes: "It would be a very curious and unsatisfactory result if in construing a provision of constitutional law, always understood to have been adopted for protection and security to the rights of the individual as against the government, and which has received the commendation of jurists, statesmen and commentators, as placing the just principle of common law on that subject beyond the power of ordinary legislation to change or control them, it shall be held that if the government refrain from the absolute conversion of real property to the uses of the public, it can destroy its value entirely; can inflict irreparable and permanent injury to any extent; can, in effect, subject it to total destruction without making any compensation, because, in the narrowest sense of that word, it is not taken for the public use. Such a construction would pervert the constitutional provision into a restriction upon the rights of the citizen as those rights stood at the common law, instead of the government, and make it an authority for the invasion of private rights under the pretext of public good, which had no warrant in the laws or practices of our ancestors."

To this cogent statement, however, the learned justice adds: "We are not unaware of the numerous cases in the state courts in which the doctrine has been successfully invoked, that for a consequential injury to the property of the individual arising from the prosecution of improvements of roads, streets, rivers and other highways for the public good there is no redress; and we do not deny that the principle is a sound one in its proper application to many injuries to property so originating. And when in the exercise of our duties here we shall be called upon to construe other State Constitutions, we shall not be unmindful of the weight due to the decisions of the courts of those States. But we are of the opinion that the decisions referred to have gone to the utmost limit of sound judicial construction in favor of this principle, and in some cases beyond it, and that it remains true that where real estate is actually invaded by superinduced additions of water, earth, sand and other materials, or by having any artificial structure placed on it so as to effectually destroy it or impair its usefulness, it is a taking within the meaning of the Constitution, and that this proposition is not in conflict with the weight of judicial authority in this country, and certainly not with sound principles. Beyond this we do not go, and this case calls us to go no further." It seems evident, therefore, that an "actual" invasion of property is essential for the full application of the doctrine thus announced.

The case just quoted declared, as we have seen, in Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra, to be a somewhat extreme statement against the public of what constitutes a taking of property for the public use is really distinguishable from that before the court. In the one case the construction of the dam so as to raise the waters of the lake was not authorized. In the other the cross-tides dam, as it stands, about which the complaint is made, is part of an authorized system of river and harbor improvements, and this has been expressly so decided by the supreme court itself in the case of South Carolina v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 4, 23 L. ed. 782, a case having in question the legality of this identical structure. The obstruction then, unlike that in the case of Pumpelly against the Green Bay & M. O. Company, is fully authorized. It will be further observed that in the first case there was a continuous and virtually permanent submersion of the land by the waters of the lake, and its practical destruction for all the valuable purposes for which it might otherwise have been utilized.

In the case at bar, it is simply complained that the drainage of the rice land is impaired by raising the low-water level of the Savannah River two or three feet, thus making the bottoms of the plaintiffs' ditches and canals and sills and flood-gates from one to two feet below the low-water level, and by increasing the liability of said rice lands to overflow, the frequently occurring freshets in the Savannah River rendering it necessary for the plaintiffs to raise banks surrounding the rice fields.

Aside from the doubt which exists as to the right, as against the public, of the plaintiff to divert the waters of this navigable stream to the injury of navigation or to use them for any other purpose save that of navigation, which will be presently considered, it is evident that the injury complained of is by no means so direct and absolute as in the case of Pumpelly v. Green Bay M. O. Co., supra. It is moreover true that whatever may be the franchise of the plaintiff in the lands, submerged by the flow of the tide, this franchise was subordinate to the power of Congress to provide for the necessities of navigation by means of which the interstate and foreign commerce of the country is carried on. Wood, Nuisances, § 615. The paramount authority of Congress to control the entire subject of the improvement of navigation upon waters of the United States is affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, not only in the case of South Carolina v. Georgia, supra, but also in the case of the Newport & O. Bridge Co. v. United States, 105 U. S. 470, 26 L. ed. 1148, and a multitude of other cases.

"There can be no doubt of the general doctrine on this subject. It is within the power of the Legislature to change or obstruct the course of public waters as the public convenience may require it. Those upon whom authority is conferred for this purpose are not liable for the consequential injuries resulting from their acts, but could not trespass upon or cut a channel through private lands without making compensation for the land so taken." Gould, Waters, §§ 248, 248a, 249; Ang. Tide-Waters, p. 93 et seq.

It is long settled that the right of the riparian proprietor is to be considered as a valuable property right, although in the language of Mr. Justice Miller, in Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 504, 19 L. ed. 986: "It must be enjoyed in due subjection to the rights of the public." Rights of this character are access to the navigable part of the river from the front of his lot, the right to make a landing, wharf or pier for his own use, or for the use of the public, subject to such general use or regulation as the Legislature may see proper to impose for the protection of the rights of the public, whatever those rights may be.

In the case of Miller v. Mendenhall, 43 Minn. 95, 8 L. R. A. 89, it is held that the riparian proprietor is entitled to fill in and make improvements in shallow water in front of his land to the line of navigability, and this right though subject to state regulations can only be interfered with by the State for public purposes. See also Ladies Seamen's Friend Soc. v. Halstead, 88 Conn. 144; Boston v. LeOravo, 58 U. S. 17 How. 426, 15 L. ed. 118; Gregory v. Forbes, 96 N. C. 77; People v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 117 N. Y. 150; Steers v. Brooklyn, 101 N. Y. 51, 1 Cent. Rep. 798; St. Paul & Pac. R. Co. v. Schurmeier, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 273, 19 L. ed. 74; Parker v. West Coast Packing Co. 5 L. R. A. 61, 17 Or. 510; Truck v. Olds, 29 Fed. Rep. 788.

There cannot be any doubt, however, that all of these rights are subject to the paramount right of the public to use the river for navigation; nevertheless, if the structures described in many of the cases above cited are absolutely destroyed or injured for the benefit of the public, the riparian proprietor is entitled to compensation. It being true, however, in this case that whatever rights the plaintiffs may possess are subordinate to the paramount public right to improve the navigation of the river, and that the structure of the defendant is not on the land of the plaintiffs, it follows that the plaintiffs' demand must depend upon the alteration in the flow between high and low water mark, of the navigable stream itself. A franchise so depending has been held to be not private property, but an incorporeal hereditament. Parker v. West Coast Packing Co. supra.

But whether the franchise or usufruct of the plaintiffs in the flow of the stream between high and low water mark, for injury to which the suit is brought be strictly an incorporeal hereditament or otherwise, it would appear difficult upon reason or authority to justify the action they have brought. It would seem to be otherwise if the stream were not navigable, but upon navigable waters any franchise depending upon the use of the stream itself seems to be common to all and to relate to the purposes of navigation and to facilities therefor.

The recent case of Fulmer v. Williams, 129 Pa. 191, 1 L. R. A. 608, is an instructive decision upon this topic. In that case the plaintiff owned a factory on the west bank of the Lehigh River, and had constructed a dam to an island about eighty feet from that bank, the effect of which was to raise the water about one foot above its ordinary level, thus supplying the water-power for his mill. The defendant, Fulmer, owned land adjoining, and next above, the land of the plaintiff. The evidence showed that he deliberately and maliciously filled up the channel below low-water mark for the express purpose of depreciating the value of the plaintiff's property and of destroying his water-power. The Lehigh River is a navigable stream and the plaintiff had no grant from the State to use the water for any purpose. The defendant denied that the plaintiff had title to the water-power, as riparian owner or otherwise. The court below instructed the jury, however, that between low and high water marks the plaintiff was the owner of the soil, and, subordinate to the right to navigate the stream by the public, he had a right to use the water and could recover for the destruction of his water-power so far as it occurred with relation to the water flowing above the low-water mark.

Upon this subject, the supreme court, Williams, J., delivering the opinion, held that "the grant of land bounded upon a stream not navigable extends, usque ad flum medium aqua; but a grant of land bounded upon a navigable river extends to ordinary low-water mark only. Between this line and high-water mark the land of the grantee is by the nature and necessities of the situation subject to a servitude in favor of the public. . . . The grantee takes subject to the rights of the public in and upon the highway, and, as between him and the public, he may use his lands below the line of high water for such purposes only as do not interfere with the free flow and navigation of the water that flows over it."

"What rights," the learned justice continues, "has a riparian owner in the water of a navigable river flowing between high and low water marks? The water of a stream is not the subject of ownership in the ordinary sense of that word. . . . The right to the use of the water follows the ownership of the bed in which it flows. The Commonwealth is therefore the owner of the rivers and holds them for the use of its citizens. They are public property, natural highways, open to all who may have occasion to use them. When the volume of the stream swells in time of high water, its surface remains the surface of the highway, and the riparian owner must do nothing that shall interfere with the use of the highway or any part of it by the public up to the line of high water. . . . The owner of the shore, having no ownership in the water, has, as between himself and the Commonwealth, no greater rights in it than any other citizen. He has no right to erect a dam to turn the water to his mill without a grant from the Commonwealth of the right so to do; and if he erects such a dam without a grant, he is a trespasser and acquires no title to the water-power resulting therefrom. He stands in the same position as an intruder upon a public road, without right and liable to removal at any moment. He has an indisputable right as a citizen to the use of the river as a public highway, but as a riparian owner he has no right to obstruct its flow, or to divert its waters, except for domestic purposes, and within certain limits for purposes of irrigation. If he does erect a dam and turn the water to his mill, he ordinarily infringes the public right only. . . . Applying these principles to the case now before us, it is clear that the plaintiff was allowed to recover for what did not belong to him. He had no title to the water whether above or below low-water mark, and he could have no legal right to the power resulting from the erection of his dam. Its destruction was therefore damnum absque injuria."

This case seems altogether applicable to the use of the waters of the Savannah River by the plaintiff for the purpose of flooding his rice fields. The Savannah has been repeatedly held to be a navigable river. See the recent case of Lawton v. Comer, 7 L. R. A. 55, 40 Fed. Rep. 480, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, decision rendered May 25, 1891.

If the malicious and deliberate diversion of the water by the defendant in the case of Fulmer v. Williams, supra, so as to destroy the water-power of the plaintiff's mill, is damnum absque injuria, much more is this true of the diversion of the waters of the Savannah from the rice canals and ditches of the plaintiff by the officers of the government for the improvement of the navigation of the stream, and for the most important uses of the public.

In the case of Henry v. Newburyport, 149 Mass. 582, 5 L. R. A. 179, it was held that the owner of lands not accessible to navigation from the sea has no cause of complaint because of being deprived by the erection of walls, or by the filling up of flats, of the ebb and flow of the tide to his premises, or the right thereof to drain from the lands of others; and further, that such an owner can only maintain an action for damages by reason of nuisance when some right of his own has been invaded.

In the case of Fitchburg R. Co. v. Boston & M. R., 8 Cush. 88, it was held, Chief Justice Shaw rendering the opinion, that if the piers of a bridge which is authorized by the Legislature change tidal currents, a littoral proprietor is not entitled to recover the expense of a structure necessary to protect his land. It is 12 L. R. A.

incident to the power of the Legislature to regulate a navigable stream so as best to promote the public convenience.

These cases are valuable because in Massachusetts, as in Georgia, the low-water line is the boundary of littoral proprietors on tide-waters.

In the case of Davidson v. Boston & M. R., 8 Cush. 105, certain riparian proprietors were using for their mills and for navigation in connection therewith, certain flats from which the tide wholly ebbs, lying between up-land territory and navigable water. The plaintiff had erected a mill, the motive power of which was the ebb and flow of the tide. The defendant, a railroad company, which the Legislature had required by the provisions of its charter to pay for private property taken by it, built a solid embankment across the flats, thereby entirely shutting off the flow of the tide and thus destroying the value of the plaintiff's mill. It was held by the court upon suit brought to recover the value of the water right taken, that the plaintiff had no right as against the public to have those flats kept open.

The plaintiffs here rely upon the Act of the General Assembly of Georgia of 1790, Code 2882. It is as follows: "All persons owning or who may hereafter own lands on any watercourses in this State, are authorized and empowered to ditch and embank their lands so as to protect the same from freshets and overflows in said watercourses; provided, always, that the said ditching and embanking does not divert said watercourse from its ordinary channel; but nothing shall be so construed as to prevent the owners of land from diverting unnavigable watercourses through their own lands."

Aside from the fact that this would seem to deny to the plaintiffs the right to divert the water of a navigable stream through their lands, the Act was passed after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by the State of Georgia, and is of course subordinate to that provision relating to the control of commerce, and as a consequence of the navigable waters by Congress. And there are many authorities to the effect that this control is paramount, even where the State has undertaken to make enactments upon the subject of navigation itself.

Very great importance is attached by the plaintiffs to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Great Falls Mfg. Co., 112 U. S. 647, 28 L. ed. 847. There, however, was an actual appropriation of the plaintiff's lands, and the water-power they were bought to control. There was an actual conversion of private property to public use. Besides, the appropriation was not for the purpose of the improvement of a navigable stream, and the property of the plaintiffs in that case, unlike that involved in the question before this court, was in no way subservient to the government for the public use for which it was taken. It was a distinct exercise of the right of eminent domain, and not, as in the case here, the proper exercise of the legitimate and ordinary functions of the government from which a consequential damage to the plaintiffs may have resulted. Moreover, Congress had distinctly recognized the right of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company to compensation, and had submitted the liability of the United States, for the conversion of the property, to arbitration, the results of which merely were affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Upon a careful consideration of all that has been advanced by the plaintiffs in support of their claim, we are of the opinion that all the right they have in the ebb and flow of the tide of the Savannah River is subordinate to the control of the government over that navigable stream for its free navigation by the public.

We are further of the opinion that the free navigation of that stream comprehends necessarily all of those improvements which the government is at liberty to make, to facilitate and enlarge the interstate and foreign commerce carried upon its waters, and, the sovereign authority of the nation having determined that the waters of the river shall be confined for the purpose of scouring and deepening the channel, the plaintiffs have no legal claim against the government for the diversion of those waters from their rice fields, or for an increase in the flow of the tide which will fill the canals and ditches they have constructed on the level between low and high water mark, a level which is subservient to the government for the purposes of navigation.

It must be observed, with relation to the claim of damage caused by the overflow of the plaintiffs' lands during the freshets, that they do not stand in the attitude of landowners above mean or high-water level. Their lands are reclamations, as appears from the declaration, which would be covered not only by ordinary high water, but by the ordinary flow of the tide. The government, as we have seen, has found it necessary to change this flow for the purposes of navigation, and the reclamations of the plaintiffs are subservient to that necessity. Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 491-495; United States v. Pacheco, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 587, 17 L. ed. 865; Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 411, 10 L. ed. 1018; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224; Gould, Waters, § 27.

If it had been possible, however, to have reached a different conclusion as to the rights of the plaintiffs, we are clearly of the opinion that the court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine the plaintiffs' demand, because it makes a case sounding in tort, and therefore is specially excepted from the operation of the Statute extending the jurisdiction of the court of claims to the circuit and district courts of the United States. If it were an action pending between individuals, it would be necessarily ex delicto. It is a nuisance to stop or divert waters that used to run to another's meadow or mill. 3 Bl. Com. 218. Running out a dam into the waterway of a navigable river, giving new direction to the current, causing his neighbor's land to be washed away, is a tort. 1 Addison, Torts, § 4. The overflow of lands by a mill-pond is a tort. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 978, citing Wilson v. Myers, 4 Hawks, 78. See also 1 Chitty, Pl. pp. 140-142.

Tort includes wrong suffered in consequence of the negligence or malfeasance of others, where the remedy at common law is by an action on the case. Leathers v. Blessing, 105 U. S. 626-630, 26 L. ed. 1192, 1194.

Plaintiffs insist that the dam erected to improve the navigation of the river has raised the level of mean low tide, and the latter result has destroyed their usufruct in the waters of the river for the purposes of rice culture on their lands on Hutchinson's Island and on the main land. They are not suing for the conversion of the land, nor is it alleged that the government has converted to its own use the water-rights connected with the lands, but they are suing for consequential injuries to their water-rights, resulting indirectly from the act of the government, which act was performed for a lawful purpose and not performed on the land with which the usufruct was connected.

It is true that if the property be tortiously taken or converted, the tortfeasor may be sued in trespass or trover, or the injured party may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit. In the latter case the same result follows as if there had been an implied contract, as insisted by the plaintiffs here. May v. LeClair, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 285, 20 L. ed. 58.

This, however, is applicable where there has been an actual conversion of the property, and not an indirect injury to it resulting from acts which the alleged tort-feasor had the legal right to perform. Any demand of the plaintiff therefore must be based upon the tortious conduct of the defendant's agents; but to constitute a tort, two things must occur, actual or legal damage to the plaintiff, and a wrongful act committed by the defendant.

The court being of the opinion that neither of these essentials exist in the case at bar, we feel constrained on both the questions herein considered to sustain the demurrer to the plaintiffs' declaration and order the case dismissed.

Turner O. THOMAS, Admr., etc., of J. Pinckney Thomas, Deceased.

(....Fed. Rep.....)

1. A circuit court of the United States has no jurisdiction, in an action at law upon

NOTE.—Suits by assignees of choses in action.

The court has no jurisdiction over cases where an assignee is plaintiff unless the court would have had jurisdiction had the action been brought by the assignor. Newgas v. New Orleans, 33 Fed. Rep. 198.

But where the transfer of choses in action may be made by delivery, and the obligation is made to bearer and by a corporation, the court has jurisdiction, although had the suit been brought by a a note, to enforce a specific lien upon property conveyed to secure it, according to a remedy and practice given by state law, without foreclosure proceedings; at least it has none in favor of an assignee of the note without indorsement or guaranty, who has taken no conveyance of the property from the maker of the note.

2. A motion to vacate what purports to be a judgment, but which is a nullity because of lack of jurisdiction, may be granted even after the term in which the entry was made.

3. A stipulation in a note that the entire amount shall be due after thirty days' default in payment of interest creates a condition precedent to an action brought before the date named for the maturity of the principal, and prevents a trial without a jury, as provided by Ga. Const., § 4, ¶ 7, Code 5145, in case of "unconditional contracts," where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or information.

MOTION by defendant to vacate a judgment which had been entered against him in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note, and also to vacate the execution issued thereon and the sale made thereunder. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

former holder the court would have had no jurisdiction. Ibid.

This rule is applied to an action by an assignee on a county warrant payable to bearer. Rollins v. Chaffee County, 84 Fed. Rep. 91.

An assignee of county warrants payable to a third person or his order, and not indorsed by him in blank or to the order of the assignee, cannot sue thereon in the circuit court unless such third person could have done so. King Iron Bridge & Mfg. Co. v. Otoe County, 120 U. S. 235, 30 L. ed. 623.

The Judiciary Act of March 3, 1897, was intended to prohibit suits in the federal court by assignees of choses in action unless the original assignor was entitled to maintain the suit, in all cases except suits on foreign bills of exchange, and except suits on promissory notes made payable to bearer and executed by a corporation. Wilson v. Knox County, 43 Fed. Rep. 451; Hudson v. Bishop, 86 Fed. Rep. 680.

Where the record does not show of what State the assignor is a corporation the prohibition of the statute applies. Brook v. Northwestern Fuel Co., 120 U. S. 341, 33 L. ed. 906.

The assignee of a contract cannot sue for its enforcement in the circuit court if the assignor could not have done so. Shoecraft v. Bloxham, 124 U. S. 730, 31 L. ed. 574.

So of the assignee of a written contract of lease. Republic Iron Min. Co. v. Jones, 3 L. R. A. 743, 37 Fed. Rep. 721.

So of the assignee of a contract of reinsurance. Laird v. Indemnity Mut. M. Assur. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 712.

So of the assignee of a guardian's bond. Hudson v. Bishop, supra.

So the restriction applies to the assignee of a mortgage given as security for a promissory note. Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U. S. 8 How. 441, 12 L. ed. 1147. But see Act of March 3, 1875, chap. 137.

Although the maker and payee of a negotiable note secured by a mortgage are citizens of the same State, an indorsee of the note living in another State may, since the Act of 1875, foreclose the mortgage in the United States circuit court. *Tredway v. 12 L. R. A.

Mr. Frank H. Miller, for defendant, in support of the motion:

A motion to set aside a judgment may be made after the term within the period of the Statute of Limitations.

Artope v. Barker, 74 Ga. 462.

Article 6, § 4, par. 7, of the Constitution of 1877, Code 1883, § 5145, is: The court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury in all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing where an issuable defense is not filed on oath or affirmation. Under this as the notes sued on were conditional, the judgment is void and should be opened as prayed for.

Judgments by default are opened in circuit courts of the United States like in state courts.

An unconditional contract on which the court may render a judgment is one that does not contain a condition, and where suit was brought on three promissory notes, one of which appeared not to be due, the allegation that they were due was by virtue of cov-

So it applies to the assignee of a claim for damages for refusal to pay for goods purchased under an oral contract. Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 123.

Under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 622, a suit to enforce performance of a contract is one to recover the contents of a chose in action. Shoecraft v. Bloxham, 124 U. S. 730, 31 L. ed. 574.

The circuit court of the United States has no jurisdiction of a suit founded on contract in favor of an assignee, where it does not appear that the plaintiff's assignor could have brought suit on the contract if no assignment had been made. Brook v. Northwestern Fuel Co. 120 U. S. 341, 33 L. ed. 906; Shoecraft v. Bloxham, supra.

An action to recover the amount of a mortgage bond is not within the jurisdiction of the circuit court when brought by an assignee thereof, in a case in which the assignor could not have sued. Blacklock v. Small, 127 U. S. 93, 33 L. ed. 70.

Assignee of judgment.

Where the assignor of a judgment could not have sued in the original proceedings in this court, his assignee cannot do so under the Act of 1833. Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 39 Fed. Rep. 835.

Under the Act of 1875, before its amendment in 1887, the assignee of a judgment founded on a contract could not sue on the judgment in a federal circuit court, on the ground of diverse citizenship of the parties, unless it appeared affirmatively in the record that both the plaintiff and his assignor were not citizens of the same State with the defendant. Metcalf v. Watertown, 128 U. S. 526, 33 L. ed. 543.

To what restriction does not extend.

The United States circuit court has jurisdiction of an action for damages for wrongfully entering on lands and carrying away the timber thereon, brought by an assignee of the claim against a citizen of another State, although the assignor could not himself have sued in that court. Ambler v. Eppinger, 137 U. S. 480, 34 L. ed. 765.

The exception in the statute did not extend to a suit on a chose in action to recover a specific chattel, or for damages for its wrongful caption or enants in a bond for titles set out and annexed, and it was not an unconditional contract.

Dye v. Garrett, 78 Ga. 471; Banner v. Sayne, 78 Ga. 467. See Mosey v. Walker, 84 Ga. 274; Craig v. Herring, 80 Ga. 709.

The judgment being void, no sale thereunder will pass any title.

Hobby v. Bunch, 83 Ga. 1.

The Legislature cannot give jurisdiction to courts other than is named in the Constitution.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Taylor, 8 L. R. A. 189, 84 Ga. 408.

The deed was from an improper party, the debt having been transferred.

Johnson v. Dooly, 72 Ga. 297; Parker v. Glenn, 72 Ga. 644; Wallace v. Atlanta Med. College Trustees, 52 Ga. 164.

Mr. William E. Simmons, for complainant, contra:

After a circuit court has adjourned without day, it cannot set aside one of its own judgments upon motion, even for the want of a jurisdiction over the cause; the judgment is binding until reversed on error.

The property of the defendant has been sold under the execution issued upon the judgment sought to be set aside by the defendant in this proceeding, and sales made under process issued on irregular or erroneous judgments are not affected by the subsequent reversal of such judgment.

Bank of United States v. Washington Bank, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 8, 8 L. ed. 299; Rorer, Jud. Sales, §§ 547, 565.

A judgment cannot be set aside on account of grounds which could have been taken before it was rendered, and which the defendant negligently omitted to take.

Barksdale v. Greene, 29 Ga. 418.

Unless it appears on the face of the judgment that it is void, or that the pleadings are so defective that no legal judgment could have been

It does not apply to mere naked rights founded on some wrongful act or neglect of duty to which the law attaches damages. Bushnell v. Kennedy, 76 U. S. 397, 19 L. ed. 736.

The sale of an equitable interest in land is not a mere assignment of a right of action relating thereto; and in a suit in a national court it is not material what is the citizenship of his vendor, under whom he claims. Gest v. Packwood, 39 Fed. Rep. 535.

An order drawn on a city and accepted is not an assignment of the contractor's claim, within the meaning of the Act of August 13, 1888, providing that an assignee cannot bring suit in the circuit court unless the assignor might have done so had no assignment been made. Ripley v. Superior, 41 Fed. Rep. 112.

The restriction does not extend to suits removed to such court from a state court. Delaware County v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co. 123 U. S. 473, 33 L. ed. 674.

Holders of negotiable instruments.

In the Act of 1887 the clause "or of any subsequent holder of such instrument be payable to bearer, and be not made by any corporation," the word "of," preceding the words "such instrument," should be held to be "if." Newgas v. New Orleans, 33 Fed. Rep. 193. The Act of August 13, 1888, corrects the error mentioned.

The test of the negotiability of a note, in order to determine the right of an assignee to sue thereon in the circuit court of the United States, under the Act of Congress of 1875, is its negotiability according to the principles of the law-merchant, and is not affected by state statutes. Windsor Sav. Bank v. McMahon, 3 L. R. A. 192, 33 Fed. Rep. 233.

The provision relating to suits by an assignee under the Act of 1888 does not forbid the federal court to take jurisdiction of a suit by the holder of an order, a resident of a foreign State, against the drawee, a resident of the State of the drawer, the citizenship in such case being diverse. Superior v. Ripley, 123 U. S. 93, 34 L. ed. 914.

But one who buys a promissory note payable to 12 L. R. A.

order, and afterwards fills the blank with his own name as payee, is an assignee within the Act of 1875, as amended, and is not entitled to sue, the original holder and the maker both being citizens of the State in which suit is brought. Steel v. Rathbun, 42 Fed. Rep. 360.

Where the maker and payee of a note are both citizens of the same State, it may be proved in a suit by the indorsee that the indorsee was in fact the real payee, and that there never had been any assignment of the note. Goldsmith v. Holmes, 1 L. R. A. 316, 33 Fed. Rep. 434.

Drain orders drawn by a county drain commissioner upon a county treasurer, and which are required to be paid by a tax assessed and collected from the owners of property benefited thereby, are so far negotiable that suit brought upon them by the holder is not outside of the jurisdiction of a federal court. Aylesworth v. Gratiot County, 40 Fed. Rep. 350.

Motive for assignment will not affect right to sue.

The motive with which a person purchases property or a claim has nothing to do with his right to maintain an action thereon in the national courts. Neal v. Foster, 13 Savy. 236; Vermont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 297.

When the owners of a mortgage sold it to a citizen of another State for the express purpose of giving jurisdiction if the purchaser took it in good faith without knowledge of such purpose, the mortgage passed the legal title. *Smith v. The transfer of interest by one party to a suit in a federal court, to a citizen of the same State with the other party, will not oust jurisdiction of the court. Jarboe v. Templer, 33 Fed. Rep. 213.

Even where a statute of a State provided that in the case of fraudulent assignment a court of competent jurisdiction is authorized to declare the assignment void, although the assignee is not shown to have notice of the fraud, the equity courts of the United States having jurisdiction can enforce rights under such statute. *Bernheim v. Speer, J., delivered the following opinion:

The American Freehold Land & Mortgage Company of London, Limited, brought suit in this court against J. Pinckney Thomas, a citizen of this district, for the sum of $5,816.66 on a certain promissory note which reads as follows:

"$5,000.00.

"Waynesboro, Ga., January 18, 1888.

"On the first day of December, 1887, I promise to pay J. K. O. Sherwood, or order, at the office of the Corbin Banking Company, New York City, $5,000.00 with interest from this date at the rate of eight per cent per annum, payable annually as per five notes herewith attached. Value received.

"Should any of said interest not be paid when due, it shall bear interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum from maturity as stipulated in said interest-notes, and upon failure to pay any of said interest within thirty days after due, said principal sum may, at the option of the holder of this note, be declared due, without notice, and may thereupon be collected at once, time being of the essence of this contract; and in case this note is collected by suit I agree to pay all costs of collection including ten per cent of the principal and interest as attorneys' fees.

(Signed) J. Pinckney Thomas. 3977.
No. 32220.

Indorsed,

Without recourse.

J. K. O. Sherwood.

Copies of the interest notes are attached. On the 9th day of April, 1888, the following judgment by default was taken:

"There being no defense filed on oath in this case, judgment is rendered by the court for the plaintiff vs. the defendant for $5,000.00 as principal, $990.47 as interest to this date, $599.04 attorneys' fees and $11.85 for cost of suit to be taxed by the clerk, this 9th day of April, 1888."

(Signed) Emory Speer, Judge.

After said judgment was rendered by the court, without having submitted the case, or any evidence therein, to a jury, Mr. Fred Lockhart, the plaintiffs' attorney, entered a judgment, signing the same as attorney, for the principal, interest and attorneys' fees, to be levied upon the land, tenements and hereditaments of the defendant, and especially upon 1150 acres, more or less, in Burke County, Georgia. Then followed a description, the boundaries being given, of the land.

Execution was issued in accordance with the judgment last above mentioned. The marshal was commanded to levy generally upon the lands, etc., of the defendant, and especially upon the 1150 acres described in the judgment, entered by the plaintiffs' attorney. On the fourth day of December, 1888, this property was sold by the marshal in the usual manner of marshal's sales, and was bought in by William G. Wheeler for the sum of $481.36, and the marshal's deed made in pursuance of said sale. On the 6th of August, 1890, Turner C. Thomas, the administrator of J. Pinckney Thomas, made a motion in writing giving notice thereof to the plaintiffs in the original suit to vacate the award and judgment, the execution issued thereon and the sale made in pursuance thereof, and also asked for leave to file the pleas described in the motion. The grounds of the motion which it is important to consider for the purposes of this decision are as follows:

1. That the defendant, J. Pinckney Thomas, died prior to the final adjournment of the term of court at which the judgment by the court was entered, and that no representative was appointed for the estate until the 5th day of April, 1890.

2. That the award granted April 9, 1888, was granted without jurisdiction because suit was brought upon a conditional contract, and the verdict of a jury was required before judgment could be lawfully entered.

3. Because the judgment entered on the award does not conform to the pleadings in the case, nor to the award of the court.

4. Motion is made to set aside the execution because it did not conform to the award of the court, and was issued to enforce a special lien only.

5. To vacate the sale because Wheeler, the purchaser, was an officer of the plaintiff, who acted for and in its behalf, and that the sale under the circumstances, as disclosed by the record and the deed pursuant to the sale, made by the marshal to said Wheeler, amounted to "chilling" the bid of the plaintiff in fi fa.

Plaintiff made application to be permitted to file pleas to the jurisdiction of the court, and to the effect that the note so sued on was actually given for a loan of $4,000 though nominally for $5,000, $1,000 being retained by the payee at the time of giving the note and making the loan, and was therefore usurious.

There were other grounds upon which it was sought to vacate the judgment, execution, levy and sale, which appear in the record. The American Freehold Mortgage Company of London, Limited, transferee of the contract, and the plaintiff in the original suit, object to the motion above set forth upon the following material grounds, and others which appear in the record:

1. Because after a circuit court has adjourned without day it cannot set aside any of its own judgments on motion, such judgments being binding until reversed for error.

2. The grounds of the motion ought to have been urged before judgment, and the movant being in laches cannot be heard now.

3. Because it appears from the pleadings that the court had jurisdiction and it is too late now to deny it.

4. Because sale under an execution cannot be set aside after the consummation and distribution of the proceeds thereof.

5. Because the pleas ought to have been filed before the rendition of the judgment.

The Constitution of the State of Georgia, § 4, par. 7, Code 5145, provides: "A court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury in all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or affirmation." The plaintiffs' attorney taking the judgment in this case followed the practice of the state courts and took his judgment in conformity with the rule of the superior courts of the State, number 89, a rule adopted in consonance with the clause of said Constitution quoted above.

Two important questions depending upon this action have been evoked by the motion.

Does the jurisdiction in this court, to give the judgment affirmatively, appear in the record?

Is the judgment void in view of the law of the State, because it was rendered, not upon an unconditional, but upon a conditional, contract in writing, as insisted by the movant.

The cause was pending at law, and it is insisted by the movant that the judgment granted was tantamount to the foreclosure and enforcement of an equitable lien in the nature of a mortgage, to do which is not within the jurisdiction of a law court of the United States, but is the exercise of a power belonging to a court of equity. The lien in question is created by sections 1969 and 1970 of the Code of Georgia, which provide as follows: "Whenever any person in this State conveys any real property by deed to secure any debt to any person loaning or advancing said vendor any money, or to secure any other debt, and shall take a bond for titles back to said vendor upon the payment of such debt or debts, or shall in like manner convey any personal property by bill of sale and take an obligation binding the person to whom said property was conveyed to reconvey said property upon the payment of said debt or debts, such conveyance of real or personal property shall pass title of said property to the vendee: provided that the consent of the wife has been first obtained, till the debt or debts which said conveyance was made to secure shall be fully paid and shall be held by the courts of this State to be an absolute conveyance with the right reserved by the vendor to have said property reconveyed to him upon the payment of the debt or debts intended to be secured agreeably to the terms of the contract, and not a mortgage.

Section 1970: "When any judgment shall be rendered in any of the courts of this State upon a note or other evidence of debt, which such conveyance of realty was made and intended to secure, it shall and may be lawful for the vendee to make and file, and have recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of the county wherein the land lies, a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to the defendant for said land; and if the said obligor be dead, then his executor or administrator may, in like manner, make and file such deed without obtaining an order of the court for that purpose, whereupon the same may be levied on and sold under said judgment as in other cases: Provided that the said judgment shall take lien upon the land prior to any other judgment or incumbrance against the defendant."

It will be observed that the machinery provided by these statutes belongs to the state courts, where there are no distinctions between the practice and procedure at law and in equity. And it is urged by the movant that the proceeding on the part of the plaintiff in the suit at common law, to have defined and enforced the lien provided by the sections of the Code above quoted, presents a matter not within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, sitting as a court of law. That proposition was held to be true by this court in the case of New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Gay, 38 Fed. Rep. 686, and after a more careful consideration of the authorities in the recent case, decided at this term of Alexander v. Mortgage Co. of Scotland, Limited, not reported. The judgments of a court of law usually take rank and effect in accordance with the date when they were rendered or granted. The judgments provided for by the special statutes above quoted take effect from the date of the contract between the parties. The contract, moreover, is in itself the creation of an equitable lien, where certain rights are reserved to the debtor, and certain privileges given to the creditor.

In the case of Penn v. Holmes, 63 U. S. 21 How. 484-487, 16 L. ed. 199, 200, will be found a condensed statement of the leading cases in the earlier volumes of the United States Supreme Court Reports upon this doctrine. They all sustain the following announcement made in that case for the court, by Mr. Justice Daniel: "By the Constitution of the United States, and by the Acts of Congress organizing the federal courts, and defining and investing the jurisdiction of these tribunals, the distinction between common-law and equity jurisdiction has been explicitly declared and carefully defined and established. Thus, in section 2, article 3, of the Constitution, it is declared that 'the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, etc.'"

"In the Act of Congress 'to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' this distribution of law and equity powers is frequently referred to; and by the 16th section of that Act, as if to place the distinction between these powers beyond misapprehension, it is provided 'that suits in equity shall not be maintained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where plain, adequate and complete remedy may be had at law,' at the same time affirming and separating the two classes or sources of judicial authority. In every instance in which this court has expounded the phrases, 'proceedings at the common law,' and 'proceedings in equity,' with reference to the exercise of judicial powers of the courts of the United States, they will be found to have interpreted the former as signifying the application of the definitions and principles and rules of the common law to rights and obligations essentially legal; and the latter as meaning the administration with reference to equitable, as contradistinguished from legal rights of the equity law as defined and enforced by the Court of Chancery in England." See also Basey v. Gallagher, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 680, 22 L. ed. 453; Bacon v. Howard, 61 U. S. 20 How. 22, 15 L. ed. 811; Bennett v. Butterworth, 53 U. S. 11 How. 675, 13 L. ed. 862.

In the case last cited, as in the case now under consideration, there was nothing in the proceeding which resembled a bill or answer in equity, according to the rules prescribed by this court, nor any evidence stated upon which a decree in equity could be revised in an appellate court.

In the case now under consideration there was no averment or prayer which authorized the court to give anything save an ordinary judgment at common law, and, as held in the case of Bennett v. Butterworth, supra, the error is patent upon the record and is open to correction without motion in arrest of judgment, or exception taken at the trial.

To the argument that this court may adopt the remedy granted by the statute of the State of Georgia, and enforce it, as do the courts of that State at common law, a sufficient reply is found in the language used by Mr. Justice Miller in the case of Van Norden v. Morton, 99 U. S. 380, 25 L. ed. 454: "We think the rule is settled in this court that whenever a new right is granted by statute, or a new remedy for violation of an old right, or whenever such rights and remedies are dependent on state statutes, or Acts of Congress, the jurisdiction of such cases, as between the law side and the equity side of the federal courts, must be determined by the essential character of the case, and unless it comes within some of the recognized heads of equitable jurisdiction, it must be held to belong to the other,"—citing the cases of Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co., 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 184, 18 L. ed. 765; Robinson v. Campbell, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 212, 4 L. ed. 372; Basey v. Gallagher, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 680, 22 L. ed. 453; Bennett v. Butterworth, supra, and Jones v. McMasters, 61 U. S. 20 How. 8, 15 L. ed. 805.

It is suggested that by the law of Georgia the equity of redemption of a mortgage may be sold under a judgment had upon the note which the mortgage is given to secure, without proceeding to foreclose the mortgage, and that this would as effectually conclude the movant here as if the mortgage itself had been properly foreclosed. It does not appear that this can be justified in a court of the 12 L. R. A.

United States in view of the important principle discussed and settled by the authorities last above quoted.

The case of Willard v. Wood, 185 U. S. 309-314, 24 L. ed. 210-214, is instructive in this connection. That was an action brought in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia by a mortgagee against the representatives of one who had bought the mortgaged lands "subject to the mortgage" and who had assumed to pay, satisfy and discharge the mortgage debt. Judgment was rendered for the defendant upon an agreed statement of facts, and error was assigned upon that judgment. The Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Gray rendering the opinion, after reciting the fact that the contract in question was made in New York, where the mortgagee is entitled to maintain a suit either in equity or at law, against the grantee of the mortgagor to enforce the payment of the mortgage debt, held that the form of the plaintiff's remedy "whether it must be in covenant or in assumpsit, at law or in equity, is governed by the lex fori, the law of the District of Columbia, where the action was brought. Dixon v. Ramsay, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 819, 324, 2 L. ed. 453, 454; United States Bank v. Donnelly, 88 U. S. 8 Pet. 561, 8 L. ed. 974; Wilcox v. Hunt, 88 U. S. 13 Pet. 378, 10 L. ed. 209; Leroy v. Beard, 49 U. S. 8 How. 451, 12 L. ed. 1151; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 130, 138, 27 L. ed. 104, 106, 107." "In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia," continues the learned justice, "as in the circuit courts of the United States, the jurisdiction in equity is distinct from the jurisdiction at law, and equitable relief cannot be granted in an action at law,"—citing Fenn v. Holme, 62 U. S. 21 How. 481, 16 L. ed. 198. "A statement of facts agreed by the parties, or, technically speaking, a case stated, in an action at law, doubtless waives all questions of pleading, or of form of action, which might have been cured by amendment; but it cannot enable a court of law to assume the jurisdiction of a court of equity,"—citing Seudderv v. Worster, 11 Cush. 573; McRae v. Locke, 114 Mass. 96; West Roxbury v. Minot, 114 Mass. 546.

The case at bar, while not identical with, is strongly analogous to, Willard v. Wood, supra. The suit was brought by a transferee of the note, and of the security for it, a deed or mortgage which the proceedings was intended to enforce. There was no privity whatever between the original maker of the note and the transferee. The transferee was not under legal obligation to reconvey the land to the maker of the note upon payment of the debt. In fact, the transferee had no title or deed to the land made by the maker of the note, to secure the debt, and J. K. O. Sherwood's only conveyance of the note to the plaintiff in the action was an ordinary transfer without recourse on him. When J. K. O. Sherwood, without indorsement or guarantee from himself, transferred the note given by J. Pinckney Thomas, it is presumed that it was transferred for value, and that his rights as against the maker were satisfied, and it being presumable, in the absence of indorsement or guarantee, that his interest in the note was paid off and discharged, Thomas would seem entitled to a reconveyance of the land from him, and the transferee of the note—who is the plaintiff here—to the lien of an ordinary judgment merely. Neal v. Murphey, 60 Ga. 388; Tompkins v. Williams, 19 Ga. 569; McGregor v. Matthis, 33 Ga. 417.

In the case of Palmer v. Simpson, 69 Ga. 793, a proceeding to enforce a specific lien, on certain specified property, in an action at law, was held to be equitable in its character, and that the mode of procedure should be as in equity. In the same case, p. 798, the supreme court of the State uses this language: "It must be borne in mind that Simpson is not the vendor, and could not pursue the statutory remedy under Code, 3654, because he could not make the deed. True, if the vendor to him made the deed, or would make it, he might pursue that remedy. Scruggins v. Hoadley, 56 Ga. 165. But is he bound to go to him? Can he not go at once into equity? He did so and thus subjected all the land."

In the case of Hunt v. Harbor, 80 Ga. 748, the supreme court of the State held that when the vendor of land transferred the purchase-money notes without indorsement or guarantee of payment thereof, the money due from the purchaser of the land to the vendor was paid, and the purchaser of the notes is put in the attitude of an ordinary creditor and has no specific lien upon the land, such as is created by the state statute upon the subject.

The conclusion which the court reaches, after considering these authorities, is, that the plaintiff having accepted the notes sued on without the conveyance from the maker of the land given to secure the amount due thereon, and without indorsement or guaranty, is merely an ordinary creditor of the maker of the note, and is not entitled, in a court of law, to enforce the special lien under which the land was sold. Scruggins v. Hoadley, 56 Ga. 165. See also Planters Bank of Fort Valley v. Frazer, 64 Ga. 609.

It is true that Sherwood, the payee of the note, made a deed to the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company, and gave warranty of title to the land conveyed to secure the debt, against all persons claiming under himself, but against no one else, a quitclaim deed. This deed contained also this additional clause: "This conveyance is made subject to the rights of J. Pinckney Thomas, of the County of Burke, State of Georgia, to have said property reconveyed to him, his heirs, etc., upon the terms and conditions set out in my bond to him," etc. It is also true that the Mortgage Company attempted to file a deed of reconveyance of the land in question in the clerk's office of the Superior Court of Burke County. This, however, is assailed by the movant as invalid, and the question still remains, Can the court at common law without equitable powers adjust the equities which may arise? Certainly the Mortgage Company is not legally bound to comply with the obligation of Sherwood's bond for title to reconvey on payment; but it is equitable.

To enforce, then, a contract of this character, and at the same time so to mold a verdict or a decree as to protect the rights of the contracting parties, is clearly within the domain of equity, and not within the totally separate and distinct jurisdiction of a United States court of law.

So far, therefore, as the judgment creates a specific lien upon the property described in it other than the ordinary judgment at law, it is a judgment upon a matter of which the court had no jurisdiction.

The defendants insist, however, that the term having ended we have no control over this judgment.

The numerous authorities cited by the attorney for the defendant, to wit: United States Bank v. Moss, 47 U. S. 6 How. 31, 12 L. ed. 381; Sibbald v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 492, 9 L. ed. 1169; Cameron v. McRoberts, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 591, 4 L. ed. 467; United States Bank v. Bank of Washington, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 8, 8 L. ed. 299,—wherein it is held that after a circuit court has adjourned without day, it cannot set aside one of its own judgments upon motion, even for want of jurisdiction over the cause,—were all decided upon cases where the court itself did not exceed its jurisdiction. It is true, however, that even where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and subject matter, if it makes a judgment or decree which is not within the power granted to it by the law of its organization, its decree or judgment is void.

In the case of United States v. Walker, 109 U. S. 258, 37 L. ed. 927, decision by Mr. Justice Woods for the court, will be found a condensed statement of the authorities upon this proposition. The decree under review in that case was made by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the Statute in question gave the court power on removal of an executor or administrator to order the assets of the decedent which might remain unadministered to be delivered to the administrator de bonis non. The court, however, had made an order directing the delivery of the proceeds arising from administered assets of the estate to the administrator de bonis non. This order was attacked as void because not within the power granted the court by the Statute under which it was acting. "It appears from the pleadings in the case," said the learned justice, "that the money ordered to be paid was the proceeds of a debt due the decedent which his administratrix had collected. It was not, therefore, as we have seen, assets or estate of the decedent. It was the property of the removed administrator. The court was therefore without power to direct the payment of the money to the administrator de bonis non. Although a court may have jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter, yet if it makes a decree which is not within the powers granted to it by the law of its organization, its decree is void. The limitation was well expressed by Mr. Justice Swayne, in Nash v. Williams, 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 226, 22 L. ed. 254, when he said: 'The jurisdiction having attacked in this case everything done within the power of that jurisdiction, when collaterally questioned, is held conclusive of the rights of the parties, unless impeached for fraud.' The case of Bigelow v. Forrest, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 696, is in point. It was an action of ejectment. Bigelow, who was defendant in the court below, relied for title on a sale made under a decree of the United States district court rendered in a proceeding for the confiscation of the premises sued for under the Act of July 17, 1862. Referring to this decree Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the court, said: 'Doubtless a decree of a court having jurisdiction to make the decree cannot be collaterally impeached, but under the Act of Congress the district court had no power to order a sale which should confer on the purchaser rights outlasting the life of French Forrest. And the judgment of the court was that so much of the decree of the district court as was in excess of its power was void.'

"In Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163, 31 L. ed. 873, Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, after stating that the circuit court had exceeded its authority in pronouncing sentence upon Lange, and that its judgment was therefore void, said: 'It is no answer to this to say that the court had jurisdiction of the person of the prisoner and of the offense under the statute. It by no means follows that these two facts make valid, however erroneous it may be, any judgment the court may render in such case.'

"In the case of Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914, Mr. Justice Field, after a review of the cases bearing upon this subject, announces their result as follows: 'The doctrine invoked by counsel, that when a court has once acquired jurisdiction it has a right to decide every question which arises in the case, and its judgment, however erroneous, cannot be collaterally assailed, is undoubtedly correct as a general proposition, but is subject to many qualifications in its application. It is only correct when the court proceeds, after acquiring jurisdiction of the cause according to established modes governing the class to which the case belongs, and does not transcend in the extent or character of its judgment the law which is applicable to it.'

On page 282, L. ed. 917, the learned justice adds: "Though the court may possess jurisdiction of a cause, of the subject matter and of the parties, it is still limited in its modes of procedure, and in the extent and character of its judgments. It must act judicially in all things and cannot then transcend the power conferred by the law. If, for instance, the action be upon a money demand, the court, notwithstanding its complete jurisdiction over the subject and parties, has no power to pass judgment of imprisonment in the penitentiary upon the defendant. If the action be for a libel or personal tort, the court cannot order in the case a specific performance of a contract. If the action be for the possession of real property, the court is powerless to admit in the case the probate of a will. Instances of this kind show that the general doctrine stated by counsel is subject to many qualifications.

The judgments mentioned given in the case supposed would not be merely erroneous; they would be absolutely void; because the court rendering them would transcend the limits of its authority in those cases."

The learned justice continues: "A departure from established modes of procedure will often render the judgment void; thus the sentence of a person charged with felony, upon conviction by the court without the intervention of a jury, would be invalid for any purpose. The decree of a court of equity upon oral allegations without written pleadings would be an idle act, of no force beyond that of an advisory proceeding of the chancellor. And the reason is that the courts are not authorized to exert their power in that way."

If the judgments of a court in the cases above cited are void when attacked collaterally, a fortiori will they be void, as affecting the parties to the cause in which they were rendered, and upon a motion to vacate them, it follows, we think conclusively, that the court having been advised that what purports to be its judgments is a nullity, will remove the ineffectual entry from the record of its proceedings.

As we have seen, the judgment of the court at law, attempting to define and enforce the statutory lien of the creditor in Georgia to the realty conveyed to secure his debt, is deemed to be a proceeding in equity, and not appropriate to the modes of procedure at law. The case of Mellen v. Molina Malleable Iron Works, 181 U. S. 367, 38 L. ed. 183, would seem at first glance opposed to this view. It was there held, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion of the court, that "an adjudication that a particular case is of equitable jurisdiction is not void, even if erroneous, and cannot be disturbed by a collateral attack." There, however, was an adjudication that the court had equitable powers. If it had them not, it yet had the right to decide that question. That decision was valid and operative until set aside for error. There was, in other words, a regular adjudication of the court that it had jurisdiction. That is very different from a case like that before the court here, where no such question was presented or decided, and where the court, on motion of the plaintiffs' attorney, proceeded to exercise powers which were expressly withheld from it in the laws by which it was organized.

We may next inquire whether the judgment rendered by the court in this case is void by the law of Georgia. This provides, Code, 3594: "The judgment of a court having no jurisdiction of the person and subject matter, or void for any other cause, is a mere nullity, and may be so held in any court when it becomes material to the interest of the parties to consider it." And further, Code, 8828: "A judgment that is void may be attacked in any court and by any body. In all other cases judgments cannot be impeached collaterally but must be set aside by the court rendering them." See also 65 Ga. 601, decision by Judge Warner, where it is held: "When a court transcends the limits prescribed for it by law, and assumes to act where it has no jurisdiction, its adjudications will be utterly void either as estoppel or otherwise." Herman, Estoppel, 45

It is true that in this case the court gave the judgment without the intervention of a jury. Because of the 7th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and the Acts of Congress embraced in §§ 648 and 649 of the Revised Statutes, this would be manifestly a nullity, unless the Constitution and laws of Georgia will authorize it. In this connection it will be instructive to consider Barney v. Schneider, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 251, 252, 19 L. ed. 649, 650; Flanders v. Tweed, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 425, 19 L. ed. 678; Baylis v. Travelers Ins. Co. of Hartford, 113 U. S. 820, 28 L. ed. 990; Kearney v. Case, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 281, 20 L. ed. 896.

It will be observed that the defendant in the original suit did not waive his right to have the facts tried by a jury. In the case of Barney v. Schneider, supra, Mr. Justice Miller observed: "It is insisted with much ingenuity that in this case there was no disputed fact for the jury to pass upon, and that, the only issue in the case being one of law, it was proper for the court to dispose of it. If this were so, the instruction of the court might be sustained, provided the undisputed facts necessary to sustain the verdict had been submitted to the jury.

In Hodges v. Easton, 106 U. S. 408, 27 L. ed. 169, Mr. Justice Harlan, in rendering the decision of the court, observed: "It was the province of the jury to pass upon the issues of fact, and the right of the defendant to have this done was secured by the Constitution of the United States. They might have waived that right, but it could not be taken away by the court. Upon the trial, if all the facts essential to a recovery were undisputed, or if they so conclusively established the cause of action as to have authorized the withdrawal of the case altogether from the jury, by a peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiffs, it would still have been necessary that the jury make its verdict, albeit in conformity with the order of the court. The court could not, consistently with the constitutional right of trial by jury, submit a part of the facts to the jury, and, itself, determine the remainder without a waiver by the defendants of a verdict by the jury." The right of trial by jury in the courts of the United States is guarded with great jealousy by these courts, and while it is true that the 7th Amendment of the Constitution preservative of this right does not relate to state action, or state courts, it is at least patent that if the award in this case made by the court without the intervention of a jury is not sustained by the law of the State, it is not sustainable at all.

The Constitution of the State of Georgia, § 4, par. 7, Code, 5145, as we have seen, provides as follows: "The court shall render judgment without the verdict of a jury in all civil cases founded on unconditional contracts in writing where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or affirmation." It is interesting to consider whether this section is under any circumstances operative in the courts of law of the United States. Assuming, however, for the purposes of this case, that it does authorize a United States judge to render judgment under circumstances where the judge of a state court might do so, certainly it would not do so otherwise.

Is the contract upon which the suit is brought and judgment obtained in this case an "unconditional contract?" It contains among others this stipulation: "Should any of said interest not be paid when due, it shall bear interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum from maturity, as stipulated in said interest notes, and upon failure to pay any of said interest within thirty days after due, said principal sum may, at the option of the holder of this note, be declared due without notice, and may, thereupon, be collected at once." Now, it is quite evident that while the coupon interest notes in the possession of the plaintiff were prima facie evidence that the interest had not been paid, yet, before the plaintiff was entitled to have the entire sum of the debt declared to be due, he must show by proof that the borrower failed to pay the interest installment within "thirty days" after it was due. This is a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to declare the entire sum due at once, an option of which he availed himself in bringing the suit. It was moreover necessary to the jurisdiction of the court to establish by proof the fact that the interest was not paid within thirty days after it was due. It will be perceived from an examination of the record that the principal sum was not due until the first day of December, 1887, and judgment for the whole amount was taken the 18th of July, 1887, and at the time the suit was brought the only indebtedness past due amounted to $316.66, a sum less than the minimum jurisdictional amount of the court. The proof to establish the fact that the interest had not been paid within thirty days, a fact upon which such an important condition depended, should, by the laws of Georgia, properly have been submitted to a jury, even though, in the language of the Constitution of the State, there was no issuable defense filed under oath or affirmation. The Supreme Court of Georgia, in Dye v. Garrett, 78 Ga. 471, had this question before it upon these facts: Suit was brought on three promissory notes in January, 1886. The notes were of equal date, one due the first of January, 1886, the second due the first of January, 1887, and the third due the first of January, 1888. It was alleged that the notes were all due at the time the suit was brought, by virtue of covenants in a certain bond for titles which was annexed to the declaration, and which provided that if the first note was not paid at maturity, then the other two notes should become due. Upon the trial of the case, the court, without a jury, rendered judgment without the consent of the defendant, and as the record shows against his consent, upon all the notes. The defendant thereupon moved to arrest judgment upon the ground that the court had no power under the facts alleged in the declaration, and generally upon the facts and pleading to render judgment without the intervention of a jury. The supreme court held this to be a conditional contract in writing. Justice Blanford, for the court, said: Notes falling due on the first of January, 1887, and the first of January, 1888, are to become due in the event and upon the condition that the first note is not paid, and there is a fact to be tried which does not appear upon the face of the papers; this fact, whether or not the first note has been paid, the judge could not try. Considering the facts and papers together, it was a condition that the last two notes should fall due upon the first note's not being paid. The fact whether that first note was paid or not was entirely outside of the writing. So we think this is not an unconditional contract in writing, and the judge could not render judgment upon these notes without a verdict of a jury unless by consent of the defendant, and no such consent appears in this record. The learned justice adds: "An unconditional contract is a contract that has no condition in it. It is manifest from the Constitution of the State that it is such a contract as the court, by looking at the paper itself, may determine that judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff in the case. This contract is not such a contract as that; the court would necessarily have to look outside of the paper to determine whether that first note was paid or not; and that question he could not determine under this writing, taking the bond and notes together. So we think the court erred in not arresting this judgment."

In the light afforded by this authority, we are of the opinion that the stipulation in the note now before the court, that the entire amount shall be due whenever it appears that the interest for one year has not been paid in thirty days after due, is equally a condition, and the proof with reference to it should have been submitted to a jury, and the court had no power under the Georgia law to render judgment without the intervention of a jury. See also Sanner v. Sayne, 78 Ga. 487; Moseley v. Walker, 84 Ga. 274.

Subsequently to the argument of this motion the attention of the court was called to the fact that the original declaration did not aver that Sherwood, the payee of the note, was a citizen of New York, the language used being merely "of New York;" nor that the transferee was a foreign corporation; and the case of Parker v. Ormsby, 141 U. S. 81, 35 L. ed. 654, was cited to show that under such defective averments, it was error to have rendered the judgment whether or not the question of jurisdiction was raised. The court was also advised that opposing counsel had been referred to this citation, but the case is decided upon the grounds comprehended in the argument had at the hearing.

The judgment of the court is, that an order be taken, vacating the award made by the court, and the judgment signed by the attorney and the execution issued thereon, and that the defendant have leave to file all proper pleas by the first day of the next term.

in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Winkler, Flanders, Smith, Bottom & Vilas for appellant.

Messrs. E. P. Smith and Rogers & Mann, for respondent:

I. Payment of some kind was to be made on or before the expiration of sixty days from the 28th day of January, 1884, and if the defendant desired to refund the premiums and avoid the payment of the amount insured, it should have given notice of such decision on or before the expiration of that day, as the determination to exercise its option was within the knowledge of the Company and not that of the plaintiff. Where one party has knowledge of a material fact not known to the other party, he is bound to give notice.

Tasker v. Bartlett, 5 Cush. 364; Quarles v. George, 23 Pick. 400; 1 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. 589, note D; Benjamin, Sales, § 577, p. 562; 2 Wharton, Cont. 619; Vyse v. Wakefield, 6 Mees. & W. 442; Smith v. Sandborn, 11 Johns. 59; Choice v. Moseley, 1 Bail. L. 186; Supple v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 59 Iowa, 29.

Where the promise has been in the alternative either to pay the specified sum, or, in lieu thereof, to deliver certain chattels at a particular time, the promisor may pay the money or deliver the chattels at his option, provided he make election of the payment or delivery before the day for performance has passed. Stewart v. Donnelly, 4 Yerg. 177; Gilman v. Moore, 14 Vt. 457; Plowman v. Riddle, 7 Ala. 778.

But if the day is permitted to pass without any election by the promisor, the right of election has gone, and the promisee has the absolute right to the money, and may maintain an action for its recovery.

Troubridge v. Holcomb, 4 Ohio St. 33; Heywood v. Heywood, 42 Me. 229; Miller v. McClain, 10 Yerg. 245.

II. If, however, there was no such express limitation of sixty days, still it was the duty of the Company, within a reasonable time after receiving the proofs on the 28th of January, 1884, to have elected if they would simply return the premiums, and so electing, to have notified the plaintiff of such election, and offered to return the premiums within such reasonable time.

III. The original proofs promptly furnished, none other being required, are evidence prima facie that the claim exists in favor of the insured, and that claim, until due election, must be good for the whole amount insured.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is to recover the insurance on two life insurance policies given by the appellant Company to Katherine Salentine, the respondent, and wife of Peter Salentine, on his life, —the first one dated the 19th day of September, 1881, and numbered 105,844; and the other one dated the 20th day of September, 1883, and numbered 115,218; the first of $2,000, and the other of $3,000. The first of the above policies had the following conditions: "That in case he should die by his own hand, etc., this policy shall be void, null, and of no effect, except that in case he shall die by his own hand while insane the amount to be paid by the company on this policy shall be the amount of the premiums actually paid thereon, with interest."

Peter Salentine, whose life was insured, died by his own hand on the 6th day of January, 1884, and notice thereof was given to the Company on the 28th day of the same month. About this policy there is no contest, and the plaintiff was entitled to and obtained judgment for the premiums paid thereon and interest. The second policy had the following conditions: "If he [the insured] shall die by his own hand, this policy shall be void. If, however, it shall be shown that the insured at the time of taking his life was insane, the Company will pay the sum insured, or refund the premiums actually received, with interest thereon, according to its judgment of the equities of the case. This option is distinctly reserved by the Company, and is made a part of this contract." The Company stipulated in the policy to pay or cause to be paid the sum insured at their office at the City of Newark, to the said assured sixty days after due notice and satisfactory proof of the death of the assured. The court found that the first notice given to the plaintiff of the election of the Company to pay only by refunding the premiums was on the 5th day of May, 1884. The sixty days after notice and proofs of death expired on the 28th day of March, 1884. The only proof of the death of Peter Salentine by his own hand, while insane, was a certified copy of the coroner's inquest, without any of the evidence taken therein. There was no evidence that the plaintiff ever made an election to take the in-insurance instead of the premiums and interest thereon, until after the notice of the Company that it elected to pay only by refunding the premiums which had been received by her. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the insurance, on the ground that the Company failed to give the plaintiff notice of its election to pay only the premiums within the sixty days after receiving the notice and proofs of death. On this appeal this is the only question, the learned counsel of the appellant contending that the Company made its election in proper time to limit the plaintiff to a recovery only of the premiums and interest thereon. The language of this condition is peculiar. The election to "pay the sum insured or refund the premiums" is to be made by the Company "according to its judgment of the equities of the case." The learned judge of the superior court seems to have limited the equities of the case to the amount of premiums paid. But there may be equities in such a case, arising from the circumstances of the death of the person whose life is insured—such as his situation in life, and the causes of his unfortunate mental condition—which might naturally appeal to sympathy and humane feelings, and arising also from the circumstances in which the wife and family had been left by this terrible calamity. To give to the beneficiary of this insurance what in pure justice and fairness she ought to have under the circumstances is a correct definition of equity. It depends upon the consideration of all the circumstances of the case. I speak of this because it is claimed that all the Company needed to be informed of to form a judgment of the equities of the case was the death of the insured by his own hand while insane, and the amount of the premiums paid, and that, therefore, but a short time was necessary for the Company to make and give notice of such election. The learned superior court held that the time in which notice of the election should be given was the sixty days after the notice and proofs of death. The sixty days mentioned in the policy has not the remotest reference to the time in which such an election should be made. If such notice ought to be governed by any rule, it should be reasonable under the circumstances. "In the absence of any statutory or contract provision, the time in which the right of election must be exercised is not limited, except there must not be such unreasonable delay as to injure rights acquired by others." McCracken v. Finley, Sneed, 195; Cooper v. Cooper, 77 Va. 198; Tybits v. Tybits, 19 Ves. Jr. 656.

The election provided for in this policy is different from any that is considered in the cases cited in the brief of the learned counsel of the respondent, or any that is usually found in reported cases, in one respect, and that is that the person to be notified of the election cannot be injured by delay if notice of the election is given at any time before suit, nor, indeed, if given after that, in time for judgment, except, perhaps, in disappointing an expectation. The plaintiff could acquire no rights which might be injured by the delay. In most of the cases the parties are reversed, and the obligee and not the obligor, and the promisee and not the promisor, is to make the election which affects the rights of the other party. It would seem that the other party ought to be in such condition that his rights would be injured by the delay to complain of it. The plaintiff, by the policy itself, was entitled to nothing, as the policy was void. By the condition, however, she is entitled to the insurance or the premiums and interest thereon, one or the other, at the option or choice of the company. She cannot know which she is to receive until such election by the Company is made, and that is all the possible consequence of the delay. So essential is it that the other party must have rights to be affected by the election that it has been often held "that an election may be revoked where the rights of others are not affected by it." Evans App. 51 Conn. 435; Dabney v. Bailey, 42 Ga. 521; Sill v. Sill, 31 Kan. 248; Adsit v. Adsit, 2 Johns. Ch. 448, 1 L. ed. 446; Elbert v. O'Neil, 102 Pa. 302; Dillon v. Parker, 1 Swann. 559.

But notwithstanding this election differs from those most common, by the absence of any rights to be injured by the delay to make it, yet it is in the form of one kind of election mentioned in the books; and we cannot say that it ought not to be made, and notice thereof given within a reasonable time. "Election presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, express or implied, of the party who has the right to control one or both, that one should be a substitute for the other." 1 Swanst. 394, and note; 3 Wood. Lect. 491. This is more like a case of plurality of gifts than of rights, so far as any consequences of delay are concerned. "An election by the obligor or promisor is not common, and it is usually and oftenest used as a legal term, as the choice of one of two things, to each one of which the party choosing has equal right, but both of which he cannot have." 2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 520, Election in note. In such a case the rights of the other party would be likely to suffer by delay. The party to receive would usually suffer only the displeasure of long waiting, or of disappointment up to the time it becomes necessary to demand that the election be made, or to bring suit to enforce it. In the view taken above of the full import of what is meant by the "equities of the case," the Company had the right to postpone its election until it could obtain information of all the facts and circumstances above mentioned necessary to a sound judgment of the election it ought to make. "An election will not be compelled, until the party has had time and opportunity to become fully informed of the facts affecting its choice." Macknet v. Macknet, 29 N. J. Eq. 54; Kreiser's App. 69 Pa. 194; Hall v. Hall, 2 McCord, Eq. 269; United States v. Duncan, 4 McLean, 99; 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 254; Dabney v. Bailey, supra; Reaves v. Garrett, 34 Ala. 558.

Can the court say that a few days over three months was an unreasonable time for the Company to become fully informed of all the facts bearing on the question of what would be most equitable for the Company to do in making the election? It seems to me not. The plaintiff had not suffered anything in her rights, and had not been peculiarly injured in the least, and had not changed her condition in any respect by reason of the delay. It may be that the following principle would obtain and be applicable to such an election: "On the failure of a person who has the right to make an election in proper time the right of election passes over to the opposite party." Co. Litt. 145a; Bacon, Abr. and Vin. Abr. title Election; Overbach v. Heermance, Hopk. Ch. 337, 2 L. ed. 442. The plaintiff did not take advantage of this principle, and elect to have the insurance, before she received notice of the election made by the Company; nor did she predicate this action for the insurance on the ground of the unreasonable delay of the Company to make the election. She has never complained of the delay, either by notice or pleading, or until on the trial of the action. The judgment for the plaintiff for the full insurance on the sole ground of this short delay, which had not injured the plaintiff in the least, was quite too strict a construction of this kind of an election. There does not appear to have been any ground for holding that the delay was unreasonable.

The judgment of the Superior Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded with direction to render judgment for the plaintiff for only the amount of the premiums paid upon both policies and interest thereon.

NOTE.—Object of cross-examination.

The object of cross-examination is to break the force or destroy the effect of the testimony given by the witness upon his direct examination, or to lay the foundation for testimony of other witnesses which shall have that effect. When a witness has been examined in chief, the other party has the right to cross-examine for the purpose of ascertaining and exhibiting the situation of the witness with respect to the parties and to the subject of the litigation his interest, his motive, his inclinations, his prejudices, his means of obtaining a correct and certain knowledge of the facts to which he has borne testimony, the manner in which he has used those means, his powers of discernment, memory and description. Butler v. Flanders, 12 Jones & S. 581.

Range of cross-examination.

¶ The legitimate cross-examination of a witness, as to the issue involved in the action, is limited to those matters as to which the witness was interrogated upon his direct examination. In strict practice a party cannot introduce his case to the jury by cross-examining the witness of his adversary. A party has no legal right to cross-examine a witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated on the direct examination. Bell v. Prewitt, 63 Ill. 382. See Harrison v. Rowan, 8 Wash. C. C. 580; Kilmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & R. 77; Castor v. Bavington, 3 Watts & S. 505; Floyd v. Bovard, 6 Watts & S. 75; Buckley v. Buckley, 12 Nev. 428; Cramer v. Culhane, 2 McArthur. 197.

Restrictions upon the right.

A party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected 12 L. R. A.

with the matters stated in his direct examination. If he wishes to examine him on other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him as such, in the subsequent progress of the cause. A party cannot, by his own omissions to take an objection to the admission of improper evidence, brought on cross-examination, found a right to introduce testimony in chief to rebut it or explain it. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 443, 10 L. ed. 535.

Cross-examination discretionary with the judge.

The cross-examination of a witness is of necessity largely under the control and within the discretion of the primary court; and appellate courts are reluctant to review and reverse their action, in limiting or enlarging its area, when the purpose is to show the bias, or motive, or to impeach the witness. Much must depend on the conduct and attitude of the witness during the examination; and much may depend on the course of the cross-examining counsel. Strauss v. Meertief, 64 Ala. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 8.

The scope of cross-examination on the case.

Whether the right of cross-examination covers the whole case, or is restricted to matters touched upon in the direct examination, is a point upon which the authorities are in hopeless conflict. The weight of American authority is in favor of restricting the right, making it simply co-extensive with the examination in chief. Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 443, 10 L. ed. 535; Houghton v. Jones, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 702, 17 L. ed. 508; Donnelly v. State, 26 N. J. L. 463; Johnson v. Wiley, 74 Ind. 233; Buckley v. Buckley, 14 Nev. 322; Fulton v. Central Bank of Pittsburgh, 92 Pa. 112; Bell v. Chambers, 38 Ala. 600; Chicago & R. I. R. Co.

fendant owned a pair of black horses; that about June 1, plaintiff examined and rode after the horses and thought one of them favored one of his fore feet a little; that thereupon defendant said the horse was all right and he would warrant him; that plaintiff did not buy the horses that day but agreed upon a price at which he could have them; that on June 5, he sent for them, when defendant gave him the following bill of sale:

Alburgh, June 5, 1888.

J. W. Hobart.

Bot of Sumner Young, Esq., one pair of black (Pilot) geldings sound and kind, $487.50. To be delivered on the cars at the depot with good halters, duties paid and certificates of the same attached hereto.

Rec'd payment,
S. Young.

That soon after plaintiff received the horses, one of them showed lameness, which proved to be caused by ringbone; that plaintiff notified defendant to take the horses back or get a mate to the off one, which defendant declined to do claiming that he was under no obligations to do so.

Defendant denied making any warranty.

One Sowers was an important witness for plaintiff at the trial. On cross-examination he testified that he came to court from Boston at plaintiff's request, but did not suppose he would pay his expenses. He was then asked: "Did you come on a pass? This question was objected to and excluded and defendant excepted.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Wilson & Hall, for defendant:

The bill of sale does not constitute a warranty. The language "sound and kind" is simply descriptive as "black" "Pilot" and "gelding" in said bill of sale.

Barrett v. Hall, 1 Aik. 269; Wason v. Rowe, 16 Vt. 525; Richardson v. Grandy, 49 Vt. 22.

A simple affirmation made in the sale of property as to soundness or the like is not a warranty unless it was so intended and understood by both parties.

Bond v. Clark, 85 Vt. 577; Foster v. Caldwell, 18 Vt. 177; Fennock v. Stygles, 54 Vt. 226.

Where representations are made several days before the sale they cannot in law form the basis of recovery on the ground of warranty or deceit unless it appears that the buyer was induced to take the property relying upon such representations and the seller so understood it; and whereas, in the case at bar, the contract of sale is in writing, what was said and done days previous to the date of the bill of sale cannot be considered in determining how the expression in said bill of sale, "sound and kind," was understood, and it was the duty of the court to have so instructed the jury.

Reed v. Wood, 9 Vt. 285; Bond v. Clark, supra.

Mr. Albert P. Cross for plaintiff.

Rowell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As to the exclusion of the question put to Sowers on cross-examination about his coming

Many American courts, however, maintain the English rule, that direct examination, even for formal proof, opens up the whole case to cross-examination. Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490; Fulton Bank v. Stafford, 2 Wend. 433; Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt. 123; Fralick v. Presley, 29 Ala. 437; Com. v. Morgan, 107 Mass. 199; Maak v. State, 33 Miss. 406; State v. Sayers, 53 Mo. 585; Haynes v. Ledyard, 33 Mich. 313.

Questions on the case must be relevant to the issue. But the same stringency is, as a rule, not required as in a direct examination. Mayhew v. Thayer, 8 Gray, 172.

It has been held that a party who has opened his case to the jury will not be entitled to establish such case by cross-examination, but must recall the witness. Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580; Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & R. 72. But see Burke v. Miller, 7 Cush. 547; Com. v. Hudson, 11 Gray, 64. #### Oral warranty.

If the article is sold by a formal written contract or a regular bill of sale, and that is silent on the subject of warranty, no oral warranty made at the same time, or previously even, can be shown, since the writing is supposed to embody the whole contract. For the same reason no additional oral warranty can be grafted on or added to, one that is written. Lamb v. Crafts, 12 Met. 353; 13 L. R. A.

Libby*, 34 Minn. 374, note; Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's notes, p. 609.

Interpretation of warranties.

It is frequently said that the interpretation or construction of a written warranty is for the court and of an oral one for the jury; but it is conceived that this means only that it is for the jury to find what words were in fact used by the parties, and under what circumstances and intent, and that being established, the construction, or "effect of it," is as much for the court in an oral warranty as in a written one, the only difference being that in the one there is no uncertainty about the language used, while in the other there may be. Short v. Woodward, 13 Gray, 83.

Of written and oral warranties.

While the warranty is collateral to the sale, it must still be regarded as an essential ingredient to the contract; and where the writing is the written repository of the mutual intent, the warranty is supposed to be incorporated with it. Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co. 2 Allen, 58; Thompson v. Libby, 34 Minn. 374; Wood v. Ashe, 1 Strobh. L. 407; Dean v. Mason, 4 Conn. 432; Mullain v. Thomas, 43 Conn. 232; *Lamb v. on a pass, it is enough to say that no offer was made to connect the plaintiff with furnishing him a pass, if he came on one. Without this the plaintiff could not be affected by the fact that the witness came on a pass. The reasons urged to show error in not allowing defendant's witnesses Clark, Darby and Fairfield to testify their offers for the horses come pretty much to the same point,—relevancy to show soundness. All these witnesses had carefully examined the horses as to soundness, and Clark testified that they were sound, and defendant's counsel say that the others did, and we think that is fairly inferable from the exceptions. The defendant, therefore, had the full benefit of their testimony on that subject; and the attempt to prove their offers was but seeking to have them give supposed emphasis to their testimony by stating, in effect, that they felt certain enough that the horses were sound to make the offers for them without requiring a warranty. It was, at best, an indirect way of trying to get at what had already been gotten at directly: and certainly the offers, standing alone, would not have tended to show soundness, for the witnesses might have considered the horses unsound and yet have thought them worth what they offered for them, and so have been willing to buy them without a warranty. It is claimed that in charging on the aspect of warranty the court assumed that the horse was unsound at the time of sale, and did not give the jury to understand that it must find unsoundness then in order to warrant recovery on that ground. It is true that the court said nothing in that part of its charge about finding unsoundness; but in charging on the aspect of deceit the court expressly told the jury that the burden of proving deceit was on the plaintiff, and that before they could find for him on that ground they must be convinced by a fair balance of evidence that the horse was unsound at the time; and in this connection the court charged that the same rule of evidence applied to the other branch of the case. We think it clear that the jury was not left to suppose that there could be a recovery on the warranty without finding a breach. It is conceded that the court correctly charged the law of warranty, but claimed that it did not apply it to either branch of the case, for that it did not tell the jury that in order to make the defendant's representations binding upon him he must have made them with the view of having the plaintiff receive them as true, and that the plaintiff must have made the purchase relying upon them. As to the aspect of warranty, certainly this claim has no foundation, for in connection with the proposition of law conceded to contain all the elements of a warranty the court expressly told the jury that they must make that rule their guide in applying the evidence, and determine whether what they found was said and done amounted to what the law calls a warranty. And again, in restating the questions at the close of the charge, the jury were told, among other things, that they were called upon to determine whether there was a warranty under the law laid down to them, defining what a warranty is in law. All this was quite sufficient. As to the aspect of deceit, the jury were told that they must deter-

Exceptions under the general rule.

The above paragraph states the prevailing rule, but it is the exception under it that applies with peculiar force to the case at bar. If the writing is merely an informal memorandum, and is not regarded by either party as evidencing the ultimate intent, then the sale rests in parol, and its terms, condition and character may be proved by either oral or written evidence. It follows, as a corollary, that in such a case written evidence is not the only medium of proof as to the warranty, even where the other terms are embodied in the form of a memorandum. Cassidy v. Bearden, 6 Jones & S. 321; Sutton v. Crosby, 54 Barb. 80; Boorman v. Jenkins, 12 Wend. 586; Filkins v. Whyland, 24 N. Y. 388; Hildreth v. O'Brien, 10 Allen, 104; Stacy v. Kemp, 97 Mass. 168; Wallace v. Rogers, 2 N. H. 506; Gordon v. Waterous, 36 U. C. Q. B. 321; Atwater v. Clancy, 107 Mass. 365; Koop v. Handy, 41 Barb. 454; Hazard v. Loring, 10 Cush. 317; Fletcher v. Willard, 14 Pick. 464; Schenck v. Saunders, 18 Gray, 37; Perrine v. Cooley, 39 N. J. L. 449; McMullen v. Williams, 5 Ont. App. 518.

It follows a fortiori that parol evidence of a warranty is competent, even in the presence of a written receipt for the purchase price. Filkins v. Whyland, 24 N. Y. 388.

The propositions of the text are further sustained by the following authorities: Sharp v. Radebaugh, 70 Ind. 547; Brown v. Owen, 94 Ind. 61; Bradford v. Manly, 18 Mass. 136; Davenport v. Mason, 15 Mass. 66; Irwin v. Thompson, 37 Kan. 643; Barker v. Bradley, 42 N. Y. 316; Foot v. Bentley, 44 N. Y. 166; Crocker v. Higgins, 7 Conn. 342; Riale v. Phenix Bank, 38 N. Y. 318; Kemp v. Byne, 54 Ga. 527; Bradshaw v. Combs, 102 Ill. 428; Hutchins v. Hebbard, 34 N. Y. 24; Lash v. Parlin, 78 Mo. 391; Green v. Randall, 61 Vt. 67; Lehnardt v. Schields, 18 Mo. App. 498; Amoret v. Montague, 63 Mo. 201; Brown v. Owen, 94 Ind. 81; Tomlinson v. Briles, 101 Ind. 588; Smith v. O'Donnell, 8 Lea. 468; Shepard v. Haas, 14 Kan. 443; Kinney v. Whiton, 44 Conn. 262; Brewster v. Countryman, 12 Wend. 446; Fisher v. Abeel, 66 Barb. 381; Richards v. Fuller, 37 Mich. 161; Tisdale v. Harris, 20 Pick. 9; Brigg v. Hilton, 1 Cent. Rep. 307, 99 N. Y. 517; Pike v. Fay, 101 Mass. 130.

It may be said that representations made in connection with an executory contract of sale, which, in case the contract was executed, would constitute an express warranty greater than the law would imply, become, upon the execution of the contract and delivery of the goods, an express warranty, which survives the acceptance of the goods. Foot v. Bentley, supra; Day v. Pool, 59 N. Y. 416; Parks v. Morris Ax & Tool Co. 54 N. Y. 582; Dounce v. Dow, 64 N. Y. 414.

An English case in point.

An early English case the force of which has never been questioned is almost a direct affirmation of the principle established by the decision of the learned judge in the case under review. The case is reported in 1 El. & El. and establishes a proposition which has received universal assent, to the effect that a warranty of soundness on the sale of a horse is broken if there is a malformation that has existed from the birth of the horse, and which, at the time of the sale, renders the horse less fit for reasonable use. Holliday v. Morgan, 1 El. & El. 1.

Where a horse has a malformation which existed from its birth, and it renders the horse less fit for reasonable use, as where there was an extraordinary convexity of the cornea of the horse's eye, which produced a short-sightedness, in consequence mine from the evidence whether the horse had a ringbone, and whether defendant knew it; whether defendant practiced a deceit upon the plaintiff in palming the horses off onto him with that defect on one of them; whether there was any such deceit practiced in the sale of the horses as the evidence tended to show, and as must be shown in order to make the defendant liable on that ground. We think this was sufficient to give the jury to understand that they must find both that the defendant intended to mislead plaintiff by his representations, and that plaintiff was in fact misled by them, before they could make the defendant liable on this branch of the case. The language of the court imports an intentional deceit and palming off. To "palm off" means to impose by fraud; to put off by unfair means. The language also imports that plaintiff must have been deceived and cheated by the misrepresentations, which he could not have been had he not relied upon them. It was not error to submit to the jury to find whether there was a verbal warranty on the 2d of June, the last time plaintiff saw the horses before the purchase. Although he did not buy them that day, the price was then agreed upon at which he could have them. The testimony on the part of plaintiff, admitted without objection, presented two aspects as to warranty, namely, that of a verbal warranty on June 2, and that of a written warranty on June 5. The defendant denied both, and said that the bill of sale did not contain a warranty, and that if it did he was not bound by it because of the circumstances in which he signed the bill. No objection was made to the admission of the parol evidence as varying the written contract. In this posture of the case it was the duty of the court to submit both aspects of that question; for it is not necessary that representations, in order to constitute a warranty, should be simultaneous with the conclusion of the bargain, but only that they should be made during the course of the negotiations that lead to the bargain, and should then enter into the bargain as a part of it. Wilmot v. Hurd, 11 Wend. 585; 2 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. § 929.

An important question is whether the words "sound and kind," contained in the bill of sale, constitute an express warranty as matter of law. The law of warranty has undergone much change since Chandelor v. Lopus, Cro. Jac. 4, decided in the Exchequer Chamber in 1803. It was there held that an affirmation that the thing sold was a bezoar-stone was no warranty; for, it was said, everyone, in selling his wares will affirm that they are good, or that the horse he sells is sound; yet, if he does not warrant them to be so, it is no cause of

of which he had a habit of shying; this was held to be such unsoundness as to constitute a breach of a general warranty of soundness. Ibid.

Such a defect as that in the eye of a horse, is not one of those patent defects which a purchaser is bound to notice when the horse is sold to him with an express warranty of soundness. Ibid.

The court said: "The animal had a defect of vision, which diminished its usefulness at the time of the sale. That is unsoundness within the ordinary definition. The defendant says that it was not so because the defect was congenital. But I dissent from the proposition that congenital defects cannot constitute unsoundness. The unsoundness may be either congenital or supervening after birth and before the sale."

The American authorities reviewed.

The most common case of dispute over the scope and meaning of warranties, is the warranty against unsoundness in animals. At one time it was supposed that a warranty as to soundness was not broken by a temporary and curable ailment; and even now this is held to be no breach of the warranty if the temporary ailment does not interfere with his present usefulness. But it has been held that any ailment, whether temporary or permanent, would be a breach of the warranty of soundness, if there has been any alteration of structure, or the prevalence of the disease in any way interferes with the present or future usefulness of the animals. On the other hand, temporary lameness has been held to be no breach of the warranty, and so, likewise, a simple cold, which could be controlled by ordinary remedies. But whatever variance there may be on this question, it seems to be settled that the fact that the disease is curable does not take it outside of the warranty of soundness. An incipient disease is as much a breach of the warranty as when it is fully developed. This has been held to be the case with glanders and rheumatism. "Cribbing" is an unsoundness. Roberts v. Jenkins, 21 N. H. 119; Kenner v. Harding, 35 Ill. 264; Coates v. Stephens, 2 Mood. & R. 187; Schurtz v. Kleinmeyer, 36 Iowa, 322; Holliday v. Morgan, 112 L. R. A.

El. & El. 1; Kiddell v. Burnard, 9 Mees. & W. 663; Knoreg v. White, 10 Ala. 255; Brown v. Bigelow, 10 Allen, 242; Springstead v. Lawson, 23 How. Pr. 302; Thompson v. Bertrand, 23 Ark. 731; Alexander v. Dutton, 58 N. H. 232; Bolden v. Brogden, 2 Mood. & Rob. 118; Finley v. Quirk, 9 Minn. 194; Woodbury v. Robbins, 10 Cush. 530; Crouch v. Culbreath, 11 Rich. L. 9; Fondren v. Duffee, 30 Miss. 323; Hook v. Stovall, 21 Ga. 66; Stephens v. Chappell, 3 Strobb. L. 80; Dean v. Morey, 38 Iowa, 120; Washburn v. Cuddihy, 8 Gray, 430; Walker v. Hoisington, 43 Vt. 608. See Tiedeman, Sales, § 194, where this entire subject receives exhaustive and discriminating treatment.

Among the defects which have been held to constitute unsoundness under the general warranty in horse sales, the text-books enumerate these: organic defects, such as that a horse had been nerved, bone spavin of the hock, and ossification of the cartilages. Benjamin, Sales, bk. 4, pt. 2, chap. 1, § 1; Oliphant, Horses, 224-225. And see Croyle v. Moses, 90 Pa. 250, as to implied warranty on fraudulent concealment.

Crib-biting has been declared to come in only under a warranty against vices (Scholesfield v. Robb, 2 Mood. & Rob. 210; but, on the other hand, it is pronounced unsoundness where shown to affect the general health and condition of the horse. Washburn v. Cuddihy, 8 Gray, 430. See also Dean v. Morey, 38 Iowa, 120; Walker v. Hoisington, 43 Vt. 608.

A warranty of soundness does not strictly cover mere badness of shape, the animal being sound when sold, not even, as it would seem, though the misshape tends to produce unsoundness. See Brown v. Elkington, 8 Mees. & W. 122; Benjamin, Sales, bk. 4, pt. 2, chap. 1 § 1.

But if the seeds of disease be shown to have been in the animal at the time of the sale, which afterwards develop with full disability, there is unsoundness within the general meaning of the warranty. Woodbury v. Robbins, 10 Cush. 530; Kiddell v. Burnard, 9 Mees. & W. 663. See note to Schouler, Pers. Prop., § 341, where the subject receives extended treatment.

action. But latterly courts have manifested a strong disposition to construe liberally in favor of the purchaser what the seller affirms about the kind and quality of his goods, and have been disposed to treat such affirmations as warranties when the language will bear that construction, and it is fairly inferable that the purchaser so understood it. Stons v. Denny, 4 Met. 155; Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198. And now any affirmation as to the kind or quality of the thing sold, not uttered as matter of communication, opinion or belief, made by the seller pending the treaty of sale, for the purpose of assuring the purchaser of the truth of the affirmation and of inducing him to make the purchase, if so received and relied upon by the purchaser, is deemed to be an express warranty. And in cases of oral contracts it is the province of the jury to decide, in view of all the circumstances attending the transaction, whether such a warranty exists or not. Foster v. Caldwell, 18 Vt. 176; Bond v. Clark, 85 Vt. 577; Shippen v. Bowen, 122 U. S. 575, 30 L. ed. 1172. But when the contract is in writing, it is for the court to construe it, and to decide whether it contains a warranty or not (Wason v. Rowe, 16 Vt. 525); and by the great weight of recent authority positive statements in instruments evidencing contracts of sale, descriptive of the kind, or assertive of the quality and condition of the thing sold, are treated as a part of the contract and regarded as warranties if the language is reasonably susceptible of that construction, and it is fairly inferable that the purchaser understood and relied upon it as such. Thus, in Hastings v. Lovering, 2 Pick. 214, the sale note described the article as "prime quality winter sperm oil." The plaintiff declared in assumption on a warranty, and had judgment. In Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Met. 83, the bill of particulars affirmed the article to be indigo. The court said that that imported an express warranty if it was so intended, and that it must be taken to have been so intended, as there was no evidence to the contrary. In Brown v. Bigelow, 10 Allen, 242, a case exactly in point, these very words, "sound and kind" were held to constitute a general warranty of soundness. In Gould v. Stein, 149 Mass. 570, 5 L. R. A. 213, a bought and sold note described the article as "Ceara scrap rubber as per sample, of second quality." The court said that it did not admit of doubt that the note was intended to express the terms of the sale, and that the contract of the parties was to be found in what was thus written, read in the light of the attendant circumstances. Held a warranty that the rubber was of second quality, and that the fact that the plaintiff made such examination of it as he pleased did not necessarily do away with the warranty. Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Har. & G. 495, is a leading case on this subject. There the bill of particulars contained a statement that the article was "winter-pressed sperm oil," and the question was whether those words were per se a warranty; and it was held that they were, for it was said they could not be regarded as mere matter of opinion or belief, but as the assertion of a material fact that the defendant assumed to know and to warrant the existence of. In Kearly v. Duncan, 1 Head, 897, the words, "said negroes, sound in body and mind," contained in a receipt for the price paid for them, were held clearly to constitute a warranty of soundness. The words, "being of sound mind and limb, and free from all disease," in a bill of sale of slaves, were held a warranty in Cramer v. Bradshaw, 10 Johns. 484. This case is criticised by Bennett, J., in Foster v. Caldwell, 18 Vt. 181, who would treat the words as a mere representation, descriptive of the property sold. But that case seems to have stood the test in New York, while Seiras v. Woods, 2 Cal. 43, and Sweet v. Colgate, 20 Johns. 203, to which he refers, and which held that no warranty arises from a description of the kind of property sold, have been expressly overruled by Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198, as not properly applying the doctrine that they correctly announce, wherein a contrary application is made, and wherein it is held that there is no distinction in principle between a representation as to quality and condition and a representation as to kind and character. And in 1 Smith, Lead. Cas., 7th Am. ed. 841, it is said that such a distinction is too refined to be practicable. In Yates v. Pym, 6 Taunt. 446, a description of bacon in a sale note as "prime singed" was held to be a warranty that it was prime singed. So in Bridge v. Wain, 1 Starkie, 504, the goods sold were described in the invoice as "scarlet cuttings." Held a warranty that they answered the known mercantile description of scarlet cuttings. The advertisement of the sale of a ship described her as a copper-fastened vessel," whereas she was only partially copper-fastened, and not what was called in the trade a "copper-fastened vessel." Held, a warranty that she was copper-fastened. Shepherd v. Kain, 5 Barn. & Ald. 240. A sold note described turnip seed as "Skirving's Swedes." Coleridge, J., said that there was no doubt that the statement was made by the defendant a part of the contract, and it was held to be a warranty that the seed was Skirving's. Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560. In Welherill v. Neilson, 20 Pa. 448, the bill of sale described the soda ash as being of a certain strength, whereas it was of a less strength and unmerchantable. Held, no warranty. It is said in 1 Smith, Lead. Cas., 7th Am. ed. 348, that this case stands almost, if not quite, alone, and cannot be reconciled with the general course of decisions in this country and in England. In Barrett v. Hall, 1 Aik. 269, the note was payable in "good cooking stoves." The court said that no definite quality could be intended from the term "good," and that it imported nothing but opinion, and was no warranty, and referred to Chandelor v. Lopus, Cro. Jac. 4, for authority, which is no longer authority. But we do not say that the court was wrong in that case, for "good" is a very common term of praise in trade, and as used in the note, ascribed no particular quality to the stoves, and might well be regarded, in that case, as mere matter of opinion or commendation, and as so understood by the parties. In Wason v. Rowe, 16 Vt. 525, the bill of sale said the horse was "considered sound." Held, no warranty, and with good reason, for "considered" was no assertion of a fact, but a mere expression of opinion. The more recent cases in this State recognize the general rule that positive statements of fact by the seller in respect of the kind or the quality of the thing sold that constitute a part of the contract or form its basis, and that are fairly susceptible of such a construction, are to be regarded as warranties. Thus, in Beals v. Olmstead, 24 Vt. 114, one of the reasons given why the defendant's statements ought to be regarded as warranties is that they were made positively, and concerning matters as to which he was supposed and professed to have knowledge. Therefore, it is said, he ought to expect to be bound by them. See also Drew v. Edmunds, 40 Vt. 401, 6 New Eng. Rep. 855; Enger v. Dawley, 62 Vt. 164.

It is sufficiently certain, as matter of construction, that the words, "sound and kind," found in the bill of sale before us, were intended by the parties to be a part of the contract of sale, and as such it would be unreasonable to construe them as an expression of mere opinion when they positively ascribe to the horses a condition and a quality that the defendant assumed to know they possessed, and that he had peculiar means of knowing, whether they possessed or not, while the plaintiff had no such means. We think the words, reading the instrument in the light of the attendant circumstances, clearly constitute an express warranty of soundness, and that the chief judge was right in so holding.

The price for which a volunteer would endure the suffering caused by a personal injury cannot be regarded as the standard in determining the amount of damages in an action for such injury, if it was not wantonly inflicted, and an instruction which suggests the idea of such a price in connection with the difficulty of fixing the amount is misleading.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Erie

NOTE.—Measure of damages for personal injuries, pain and suffering.

Damages for a personal injury include compensation for pain and suffering, but to the extent of compensation only according to the sound discretion of the jury. Lindvall v. Woods, 44 Fed. Rep. 355.

Money is an inadequate recompense for pain, but the law aids the sufferer to obtain it in such measure as a jury, considering all the circumstances, will allow. Chicago v. Langlass, 66 Ill. 361; Scott v. Hamilton, 71 Ill. 85; Pierce v. Millay, 44 Ill. 139; Lucas v. Flinn, 85 Iowa, 9; Tefft v. Wilcox, 6 Kan. 46; Slater v. Sherman, 5 Bush, 206; Verrill v. Minot, 51 Me. 299; Elliott v. Van Buren, 38 Mich. 49; Welch v. Ware, 32 Mich. 77; Johnson v. Wells, 6 Nev. 225; Ransom v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 415; Swarthout v. New Jersey S. B. Co. 45 Barb. 222; Oliver v. North Pac. Transp. Co. 3 Or. 84; McLaughlin v. Corry, 77 Pa. 109; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Allen, 53 Pa. 276; Beardaley v. Swann, 4 McLean, 338.

Plaintiff is entitled to recover, in addition to what a jury might award him for his suffering and physical injuries, only his pecuniary loss. Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 80 N. Y. 892; Ransom v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 415; Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 25.

A woman who was indecently assaulted is entitled to be fairly compensated for all injuries, temporary or permanent, directly caused to her person, including compensation for pain and suffering, mental and physical, which has been or may thereafter be caused by such wrong. Campbell v. Pullman Palace-Car Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 484.

When sickness is the direct or proximate consequence of a wrongful act, the pain and suffering are also elements of the injury for which compensation may be recovered. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Birney, 71 Ill. 391; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 59 Ind. 317; Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Andrews, 39 Md. 329; Fillebrown v. Hoar, 124 Mass. 580; Mea- 12 L. R. A.

gher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281; Whalen v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 323; Klein v. Jewett, 26 N. J. Eq. 474; Johnson v. Wells, 6 Nev. 224; Ward v. Vanderbilt, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 531; Ransom v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 415; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Brooks, 57 Pa. 339.

Not only bodily pain, but, connected with bodily injury, mental suffering,—anxiety, suspense, fright, sense of wrong from insult or indignity,—may be treated when the facts justify it as an element of the injury for which damages should be allowed. Fairchild v. California Stage Co. 18 Cal. 599; Seger v. Barkhamsted, 22 Conn. 290; Masters v. Warren, 27 Conn. 298; Lawrence v. Housatonic R. Co. 29 Conn. 390; *Chicago & A. R. Co. v. S. 5 Wall. 60, 18 L. ed. 561.

Mental suffering as an element of damages.

Mental suffering alone will not support an action; it is only when some act is done which will constitute a cause of action that injury to the feelings can be considered. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 313.

The gist of the action for injuries to the person is injury to the person, and prospective damages are considered the immediate and natural consequences. Cook v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 1 West. Rep. 451, 19 Mo. App. 339.

The jury should consider the mental anguish, as well as the bodily pain, suffered by the plaintiff (Cook v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. supra; Davidson v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 476) including anxiety, suspense and fright. Sherwood v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 38 Mich. 373.

County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

(Mrs. Phoebe Baker was injured while a passenger on defendant's road in consequence of an accident by which the car in which she was riding was thrown into the ditch. Her husband and herself brought this action to recover damages for such injury, pending which she died and her administrator was substituted as plaintiff in the action.)

The case further appears in the opinion.

Mr. J. Ross Thompson for appellant.

Mr. S. A. Davenport for appellee:

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first, second and third assignments of error are hardly just to the learned judge of the court below. They rest on detached sentences taken from the charge which need to be read in their proper connection, and which when so read are unobjectionable.

The fourth assignment is directed to what is evidently an inaccurate expression which may seem to lay down the doctrine that remote as well as proximate causes are sufficient to sustain an action; but the context shows that this was not the meaning of the judge and that the jury could not have been misled by the use of the word "remote" in the paragraph complained of. What was said was this: "The doctor tells you that the immediate cause of death was the wasting away or loss of strength, but that the loss of strength was caused by the injury." He then added, "so that the injury would be the remote cause of her last sickness," for the pain experienced, in which he had already said "she would be entitled to recover providing your verdict was in her favor." But upon the testimony of the doctor it is clear that the injury was not the remote but the proximate cause of her last sickness, for he says that the loss of strength and wasting away of which she died "were caused by the injury." There was therefore no disregard of the maxim causa proxima non remota spectatur, recognized and applied in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hope, 80 Pa. 878; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. McKeon, 90 Pa. 122, and several other cases. It was simply a mistake to use the word "remote" in describing the relation between the injury and the sickness which the doctor described as the result of the injury.

The fifth assignment is of a more serious character.

The learned judge while speaking of the measure of damages told the jury that the plaintiff's cause of action rested mainly on the inconvenience and pain suffered by her in consequence of the injury she received; and to Mental injury and anguish, intensified and aggravated by the physical condition of a person, may be regarded in estimating the damages for a wrongful injury, although the party guilty of the wrong did not know of such physical condition. Fell v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 248.

The jury may consider the case with all its facts and circumstances, and may take into account, not only physical pain, but also such mental suffering as they are satisfied must have been the natural result of the injury inflicted. South & North Ala. R. Co. v. McLeod, 68 Ala. 206; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 813; Wright v. Compton, 53 Ind. 337; Nossaman v. Rickert, 18 Ind. 350; Elkhart v. Ritter, 66 Ind. 136; Ferguson v. Davis Co. 67 Iowa, 601; Mason v. Ellsworth, 32 Me. 271; Prentiss v. Shaw, 56 Me. 427; Wadsworth v. Treat, 43 Me. 163; Goddard v. Grand T. R. Co. 18 Q. B. 110.

Damages recoverable for mental anguish. See note to Chicago v. McLean (Ill.) 8 L. R. A. 735.

Damages held not excessive.

Three thousand dollars is not an excessive allowance as a moiety of the damages recoverable by a comparatively young man having a family to support, who endured much pain and suffering for months, and whose earning capacity, which was about $1,000 per year, was diminished very greatly by the loss of a leg. Anderson v. The Ashbrook, 44 Fed. Rep. 124.

A verdict for $5,000 is not excessive where plaintiff was rendered unconscious by his fall, and had a rib broken, and, although his physical sufferings were not great, yet by a rupture of some membrane of the chest emphysema was produced, rendering respiration difficult and distressing, and the disease incurable. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Brown, 78 Tex. 397, 12 L. R. A.

Six thousand five hundred dollars damages are not excessive for injury to a sound man about thirty-two years of age, who suffered much pain and was permanently incapacitated for heavy work by a rupture, while one leg was made smaller than the other, with some stiffness in the ankle joint. The Mineola, 44 Fed. Rep. 143.

A verdict for $7,000 damages for injuries rendering a four-year-old boy a cripple for life, and causing intense suffering for many months, is not excessive. Ft. Worth St. R. Co. v. Witten, 74 Tex. 202.

Damages grossly inadequate.

A verdict of $1,000 damages for injuries resulting in the total disability of a woman twenty years of age, with continuous and severe suffering, who was previously healthy and earned $4 per week, and who had, during three years after the injuries, expended more than $3,000 in seeking to be relieved from the consequences of such injuries, is grossly inadequate. Smith v. Dittman, 34 N. Y. S. R. 306.

Considerations too remote and sentimental.

The mental pain and suffering of a mother on account of the death of her son, caused by the negligence or wrongful act of another, is too remote and sentimental to be a proper element of damages. Webb v. Denver & R. G. W. R. Co. (Utah) July 23, 1890.

Damages for the death of plaintiff's child, in an action under the Act of Congress of Feb. 17, 1885, are merely for the loss of the child's services by death, and possibly for funeral expenses, and cannot include damages for mental suffering and anguish. Bunyea v. Metropolitan R. Co. (D. C.) 18 Wash. L. Rep. 412.

In an action by the personal representative of one whose death was caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, the mother of deceased is entitled to damages not only for her pecuniary loss but for the loss of his comfort, society, support and protection, but not for sorrow, grief or mental suffering occasioned by his death. Munro v. Pacific Coast Dredging & R. Co. 84 Cal. 515.

guide them in deciding what compensation to make for suffering he used this language: "It is of course difficult to give a money value to pain and suffering. No person would voluntarily endure such pain and suffering as it is proven Mrs. Baker endured, for any amount of money. But it is the duty of the jury if they find for the plaintiff to fix some sum which would be a compensation for this pain and suffering."

The effect of this was to suggest the price in money sufficient to induce a person to undergo voluntarily the pain and suffering, for which a recovery was sought in the action, as a measure of the compensation due the plaintiff for having been subjected to it.

The learned judge first spoke of the difficulty in the way of fixing a money value upon suffering. He followed this by the statement that no amount of money would be regarded as sufficient to induce a person to undergo the pain complained of in this case, which suggested a possible standard of value that might be applied. He then finished the presentation of the subject by telling the jury that if they found for the plaintiff it was their duty "to fix some sum which would be a compensation for this pain and suffering." The idea of a price as the measure of the plaintiff's compensation is not applicable to this class of cases. In actions upon contracts it often happens that the price of the article or of the services sued for is a proper measure of the plaintiff's damages for the failure to deliver the article or to render the services. So in actions founded on tort the cost of repairing or replacing the property injured or destroyed may show to what sum the plaintiff is entitled. Such a standard cannot be applied in actions for a personal injury, not wantonly inflicted, which results in severe pain. There is no market in which the price of a voluntary subjection of oneself to pain and suffering can be fixed. There is no market standard of value to be applied, and to suggest the idea of price to be paid to a volunteer as an approximation to the money value of suffering is to give loose rein to sympathy and caprice. The true rule is that in addition to loss of time and expenses actually incurred by the plaintiff by reason of the injury, the jury may consider also the nature of the injury, the pain and inconvenience resulting from it, and make such allowance therefor as in view of all the attending circumstances may seem to be just and reasonable. The age, the health, habits and pursuits of the plaintiff must be taken into consideration in determining what is a reasonable allowance for inconvenience and suffering in any given case. The absence of a cruel or wanton purpose in the defendant must not be overlooked. From the whole case the question is what is a reasonable allowance for the suffering necessarily endured. This question is for the jury subject nevertheless to the supervisory control of the court whose duty it is to set aside a verdict that is unreasonable and excessive.

In all other respects this case seems to have been well tried, and we greatly regret the necessity for sending it back. There seems, however, no escape from the conclusion that the fifth assignment presents substantial error which requires correction.

Where a delivery on a sale for cash is made before payment, either conditionally or upon a trust, the vendor may reclaim the property as against the vendee, or any transferee of his who has not made advances of money on the faith thereof as bona fide purchaser. Dows v. Dennistoun, 28 Barb. 398; Fleeman v. McKean, 25 Barb. 479.

Upon a sale of goods for cash to be paid on delivery, the title does not pass to or vest in the purchaser for actual delivery without payment, unless the condition is waived. Smith v. Lynes, 5 N. Y. 41, reversing 3 Sandf. 308; Strong v. Taylor, 3 Hill, 330; Fleeman v. McKean, 25 Barb. 474.

A delivery of property on condition that title shall not pass unless the price is paid at a set time, and that, if it is not, the seller may resume possession, does not transfer the title. *Herring v. ### When condition is not waived.

Mere delivery of the goods sold for cash is not necessarily a waiver of the condition. The seller has a right to explain the delivery by evidence. Fleeman v. McKean, 25 Barb. 474.

It is not necessary to a qualified or conditional delivery that the qualification or condition intended to be annexed to the delivery should at the time be declared by the vendor in express terms. *Smith v. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of a piano. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jackson E. Long and Morris Loveman for appellant.

Messrs. Cabaniss & Weakley, for appellee:

Even though the contract of conditional sale in this case may have been void in the State of Georgia, as against third persons, because not recorded, when brought into this State it came under the operation of our laws, and, being still good as between the parties, was also good and valid in this State as against third persons, there being no requirement that such contracts should be recorded.

fide purchaser parting with value. Dows v. National Bank of Milwaukee, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214; Farmers & M. Nat. Bank of Buffalo v. Hazeltine, 78 N. Y. 104.

To constitute one a bona fide purchaser, within the rule for the protection of a bona fide purchaser against a prior equity, the conveyance must be executed and the purchase money actually paid before notice. Dows v. Dennistoun, 28 Barb. 393; 2 Sugd. Vend. 8th Am. ed. by J. C. Perkins, 522, 523 (762, 763); Heatley v. Finster, 3 Johns. Ch. 159, 1 L. ed. 330; Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 65, 66, 2 L. ed. 223, 224; Clark v. Mauran, 3 Paige, 373, 3 L. ed. 198.

If it can be inferred from the acts of the parties and the circumstances surrounding the transaction that it was the intent that delivery and payment should be concurrent acts, the title will be deemed to have remained in the vendor until the condition of payment is complied with. Benjamin, Sales, Am. ed. § 380, and notes; Leven v. Smith, 1 Denio, 571; Hammett v. Linneman, 48 N. Y. 300; Smith v. Lynes, 5 N. Y. 41; Parker v. Baxter, 36 N. Y. 566; Russell v. Minor, 22 Wend. 666.

The question of intent is one of fact, not of law. It is for the jury, not for the court, to pass upon. Hall v. Stevens, 40 Hun, 578; Hammett v. Linneman, supra.

It is abundantly settled that a conditional sale, with a lien for the purchase price reserved, although the contract is contained in papers calling the transaction a consignment, is worthless as to the creditors of the purchaser although good as between the parties. Peek v. Helm, 127 Pa. 500.

The code provisions.

This subject is regulated by code provisions in several of the States. Thus under Ga. Code, § 1935, the written contract of a conditional sale must be recorded in the clerk's office of the county where the vendee resides; and the record in some other county will not suffice. Cohen v. Candler, 79 Ga. 437.

The North Carolina Code, § 1975, provides that conditional sales of personal property in which the title is retained by the bargainor shall be reduced to nil.

Clopton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the written contract introduced in evidence Freyer & Co. agreed to sell the piano in controversy to Paul Franklin for $300, payable in installments, stipulating that the title and ownership should remain in them until the entire purchase money is paid, and reserving the right, in case of default in the payment of any part thereof, and the failure of Franklin to return the property on demand, to take possession by legal process. Such contract being, according to our later decisions, a conditional sale, the title does not pass until the contract price is paid, notwithstanding delivery of possession; and a bona fide purchaser of the property from the vendee, acquiring only his conditional title, is not protected against a recovery by the original vendor, unless he has conferred on his vendee indicia of ownership other than mere possession, or has waived or forfeited his right in the property. Sumner v. Woods, 67 Ala. 189; Fairbanks v. Eureka Co. Id. 109.

The contract between Freyer & Co. and Franklin was made October 29, 1885, in the State of Georgia, where the vendors and the vendee then resided, and where the property was situated. Franklin having retained possession in that State for about two and a half to writing and registered, like chattel mortgages. Harrell v. Godwin, 102 N. C. 330.

So by a parity of reasoning an agreement by which the title of the thing sold is to remain in the vendor until a promissory note representing the purchase price, payable by installments, shall have been fully met, is valid and effective; and on failure of such payments the vendor may recover possession of the property. Goldie v. Rascony, 4 Montreal L. Rep. 312.

An actual delivery of personal property into the possession of a vendee under an agreement to pay cash is a conditional sale, and is not absolute, unless payment is waived. Lang v. Rickmers, 70 Tex. 108.

No particular form required.

No particular words or forms of expression are really necessary for the creation of a conditional sale. Any words which indicate an intention to annex a condition to the sale will be sufficient. Such phrases, however, as "on condition," "provided," "if it shall so happen," etc., are found in constant use, in the making of conditional sales, and, if employed, will usually remove any doubt as to the sale or transfer being conditional. But whether these expressions are used or not, if the intention of the parties to make the sale dependent upon the happening of some event or the performance of some collateral obligation can be ascertained from the expressions of the parties, it will be a conditional sale, it matters not what may be the language used. See Goldsborough v. Orr, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 217, 5 L. ed. 600; Gill v. Weller, 52 Md. 3; Fane v. Hood, 13 Pick. 231; Tipton v. Feitner, 30 N. Y. 423; Isaacs v. New York Plaster Works, 67 N. Y. 124.

In the case of dispositions of personal property by will, it is more difficult, than in sales, to determine whether they are conditional, because the language used by testator is ordinarily looser and more inexact. Tiedeman, Sales, § 201.

When vendee's title vests.

Where the vendor waives his right to receive payment before the delivery of the article sold, years, removed to this State, bringing the piano with him, and about a year thereafter sold it to defendant, who paid a valuable consideration without notice of Freyer & Co's title or right. The bill of exceptions recites: "The defendant further introduced in evidence certain sections of the Code of Georgia to the effect that, in conditional sales of personal property in that State, reserving title in vendor until property was paid for, the reservation of title is invalid as against third parties, unless the contract of sale is in writing and acknowledged, and duly recorded within thirty days from its execution; but that the same is valid as between the parties, whether in writing or not, and whether recorded or not."

Defendant insists that, the contract of sale having been made and executed in Georgia, his title is determined by the laws of that State, and that the reservation of title, the contract not having been recorded, is invalid as to him. The bill of exceptions making no special reference to nor identifying the particular sections of the Code by number or otherwise, we must take and consider the legal effect of the Statutes as set out in the record. The general rule is that, when the State where a contract is made is also the place of performance, and the situs of the property, the laws of that State become a part of the contract; and the sufficiency of its execution, its validity, interpretation and legal effect, and the rights of the parties to the contract, will be governed by the laws of that State wherever its enforcement may be sought. The rule is founded in comity, extended by express or tacit assent, and the force to be given to the laws of one State in another depends "upon its own proper jurisprudence and polity."

When the legislation of a State where the suit is brought is positive, its own tribunals must conform thereto. Also "where the nation's customary, unwritten, or common law speaks directly on any subject, it is equally to be obeyed, being of equal obligation with the positive Code. When both are silent, then only can the question properly arise as to which law shall govern." 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 503 et seq. The application of this principle is essential to prevent injustice and the introduction of insecurity, uncertainty and confusion in the transaction of business.

The direct question involved in this case came before the Supreme Court of New Jersey in Martin Safe Co. v. Norton, 48 N. J. L. 410, 5 Cent. Rep. 341. The contract for the sale of the property was made and performed in Pennsylvania. The property was immediately transported to New Jersey, and afterwards sold to a bona fide purchaser. The reservation and gives immediate possession to the vendee, with the understanding that the title is to remain in him until the full payment of the purchase price, upon a stipulated day, such payment constitutes a condition precedent; and the right of property is not vested in the purchaser until due performance of this condition. The Kimball, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 45, 18 L. ed. 54; Glenn v. Smith, 2 Gill & J. 498; Sheehy v. Mandeville, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 264, 3 L. ed. 219; Downey v. Hicks, 55 U. S. 14 How. 249, 14 L. ed. 407; *Lyman v. Notes, 7th ed. § 104, and notes, and cases cited.

Domiciliary law governs.

The law of the domicile of the owner of personal property, as a general rule, determines the validity of every transfer made of it by him. By that law an owner of property may not be divested of it without his consent, or by due process of law. Though a transfer of personal property, valid by the law of the domicile, is valid everywhere as a general principle, there is to be excepted that territory in which it is situated and where a different law has been set up, when it is necessary for the purpose of justice that the actual situs of the thing be examined. (Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 139, 19 L. ed. 109.) Yet the statutes of another State have no extraterritorial force, proprio vigore, though often permitted by comity to operate for the promotion of justice, where neither the State nor its citizens will suffer any inconvenience from the application of them. The exercise of comity in admitting or restraining the application of the laws of another country must rest in sound judicial discretion, dictated by the circumstances of the case. Blanchard v. Russell, 13 Mass. 6.

The policy of this country has been, and is, to protect the right of ownership, and to leave the buyer to take care that he gets a good title. "Notions of property are slight, when a bona fide purchase of stolen goods gives a good title against the 12 L. R. A.

original owner." Wheelwright v. Depeyster, 1 Johns. 470. We are not required to show comity to that extent; especially as it is to our citizens alone that we are administering justice.

There are judgments to the end that the law of the situs of the movable property will determine who is entitled to it, and the matter of comity is not taken into account. A notable case in point is that of Cammell v. Sewell, in the exchequer chamber (5 Hurlst. & N. 728). But there the property had not been in England until after the sale in Norway, and had never been in the possession of the English owners.

It is doubtful if after a title to property has been acquired by the law of the domicile of the vendor, and of the situs of the thing, and of the forum in which the parties stand, in a contest between citizens of the State of that forum, it has ever been adjudged that such title has been divested by the surreptitious removal of the thing into another State and a sale of it there under different laws. There are, however, decisions that it has not. See Taylor v. Boardman, 25 Vt. 681; Martin v. Hill, 12 Barb. 681; French v. Hall, 9 N. H. 187; Langworthy v. Little, 12 Ouah. 109.

The plain and elementary principle that every State has exclusive jurisdiction over its own remedial laws, and may make such provision as it deems suitable for the collection of debts by attachment, or otherwise, within its own territory, and before its own tribunals, is admitted by Mullett, J., in De Witt v. Burnett, 3 Barb. 97; Stedman v. Patchin, 84 Barb. 218.

The views stated in the text have received abundant vindication, in a case recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. (Harkness v. Russell, 118 U. S. 663, 30 L. ed. 285.) In a singularly exhaustive opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley the present situation is admirably portrayed, and many of the leading cases implicated with the topic are cited.

Possession as evidence of title.

The rule is not universal that possession is the only evidence of title to personal property. Forbes of title in a conditional sale is; by the law of Pennsylvania, invalid, as against creditors, and bona fide purchasers. The law of New Jersey is the same as in this State. In a suit by the original vendor to recover the property, the purchaser from the conditional vendee set up in defense the law of Pennsylvania. It was held that, his contract of purchase having been made in New Jersey, its legal effect, and the purchaser's rights under it, were determinable by the law of that State, by which law he acquired only such title as his immediate vendor had when the property was brought into it, and became subject to its laws. Depue, J., in an able opinion, says: "If the right of a purchaser, under a purchase in this State, to avoid the reserved title in the original vendor on such grounds, be conceded, the same right must be extended to creditors buying under a judgment and execution in this State; for, by the law of Pennsylvania, creditors and bona fide purchasers are put upon the same footing. Neither on principle nor on considerations of convenience or public policy can such a right be conceded. Under such a condition of the law confusion and uncertainty would be introduced, and the transmission of the title to movable property, the situs of which is in this State, would depend, not upon our laws, but upon the laws and public policy of sister States or foreign countries." Our own decisions, so far as they go, are in accord with this doctrine.

In Marsh v. Ellsworth, 37 Ala. 85, it was held that the lien created by a statute of Mississippi could not be enforced in this State against a purchaser, who here acquired the property in good faith for a valuable consideration, on the principle that liens on personal property given by a statute in one State have no priority of liens subsequently acquired in another State, to which the property is carried. The same principle was asserted in Donald v. Hewitt, 38 Ala. 534, and McCoy v. Odom, 20 Ala. 502. As a general proposition, when a contract is valid and binding by the lex loci contractus, it is valid and binding everywhere. The Statute of Georgia affirms the validity of the reservation of title as between the parties whether or not the contract is recorded. By the law of that State, the title was in the original vendors when Franklin brought the property into this State, of which they could not be divested except by their voluntary act, or due process of law. We have found no case, and presume none can be found, where

v. Marsh, 15 Conn. 397; Hart v. Carpenter, 24 Conn. 481; Tomlinson v. Roberts, 25 Conn. 478; Lewis v. McCabe, 49 Conn. 155.

The validity of conditional sales, and the principle that the owner may make what contracts he pleases in regard to his property, without endangering his title to it, are sustained in the following cases: Hughes v. Kelly, 40 Conn. 158; Brown v. Fitch, 48 Conn. 513; Hine v. Roberts, 48 Conn. 270; Loomis v. Bragg, 50 Conn. 233; Appleton v. Norwalk Library Corp. 3 New Eng. Rep. 644, 53 Conn. 8; Cooley v. Gillan, 2 New Eng. Rep. 826, 54 Conn. 83.

In the absence of fraud, an agreement for a conditional sale is good and valid, as well against third persons as against the parties to the transaction; and the further rule that a bailee of personal property cannot convey the title, or subject it to execution for his own debts, until the condition on which the agreement of sale was made has been performed, is well established. Harkness v. Russell, 113 U. S. 633, 30 L. ed. 235; New Haven Wire Co. Cases, 5 L. R. A. 300, 37 Conn. 352.

"General rule in this country."

In nearly all of the United States conditional sales—that is, sales of personal property on credit, with delivery of possession to the purchaser, and a stipulation that the title shall remain in the vendor, until the contract price is paid—have been held valid, not only against the immediate purchaser, but also against his creditors and bona fide purchasers from him, unless the vendor has conferred upon his vendee indicia of title beyond mere possession, or has forfeited his right in the property by conduct which the law regards as fraudulent. The cases are cited in Cole v. Berry, 43 N. J. L. 303; Midland E. Co. v. Hitchcock, 37 N. J. Eq. 550, 559; 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. §§ 437-460; Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 38-39; Lewis v. McCabe, 59 Conn. 141, 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 234, note, 15 Am. L. Rev. 380.

An important distinction stated.

The doctrine of the courts of Pennsylvania is founded upon the doctrine of Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 12 L. R. A.

80, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 33, and Edwards v. Harben, 3 T. R. 537, that the possession of chattels under a contract of sale without the title is an indelible badge of fraud,—a doctrine repudiated quite generally by the courts of this country. Runyon v. Groshon, 12 N. J. Eq. 86; Broadway Bank v. McElrath, 13 N. J. Eq. 24; Miller v. Panoast, 29 N. J. L. 25.

The doctrine of the Pennsylvania courts is disapproved by the American editors of Smith's Leading Cases in the note to Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 33, 34; and by Mr. Landreth in his note to Lewis v. McCabe, 49 Conn. 141, 21 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 224; but, nevertheless, the supreme court of that State, in a late case on the subject,—Forrest v. Nelson, 108 Pa. 481, decided February 16, 1885,—has adhered to the doctrine. It must therefore be regarded as the law of Pennsylvania that, upon a sale of personal property with delivery of possession to the purchaser, an agreement that title should not pass until the contract price should be paid is valid as between the original parties, but that creditors of the purchaser, or a purchaser from him bona fide by a levy under execution or a bona fide purchase, will acquire a better title than the original purchaser had,—a title superior to that reserved by his vendor.

The validity, construction and legal effect of a contract may depend, either upon the law of the place where it is made, or of the place where it is to be performed, or, if it relates to movable property, upon the law of the situs of the property, according to circumstances; but where the place where the contract is made is also the place of performance and of the situs of the property, the law of that place enters into and becomes part of the contract, and determines the rights of the parties to it. Frazier v. Fredericks, 24 N. J. L. 162; Dacosta v. Davis, 24 N. J. L. 319; Bulkley v. Hanold, 60 U. S. 19 How. 390, 15 L. ed. 663; Scoudder v. Union Nat. Bank of Chicago, 91 U. S. 403, 23 L. ed. 345; Pritchard v. Norton, 106 U. S. 124, 27 L. ed. 104; Morgan v. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. 2 Woods, 244; Simpson v. Fogo, 9 Jur. (N. S.) 408; Wharton, Conf. L. § 841, 845, 401, 403, 418; Parr v. Brady, 37 N. J. L. 201; Marvin Safe Co. v. Norton, 5 Cent. Rep. 341, 43 N. J. L. 410.

the reservation of title being valid by the law of the place where the parties resided and the property was situated, it was decided that the owner was divested of his title by the removal of the property without his knowledge, and its sale in another State. Edgerly v. Bush, 81 N. Y. 199. When Franklin removed into this State, bringing the piano with him, the property itself, its disposition and the transfer of title became subject to its laws. By the laws of this State the place of the domicile of the parties, and the situs of the property, the legal effect of a sale, and the rights of the parties thereunder, must be determined. By this law, Franklin could not transfer any other or higher title than that he acquired under his contract with Freyer & Co.,—a conditional title. The rule that the validity, interpretation and legal effect of a contract are governed by the lex loci contractus applies only to the determination of the rights and obligations of the parties to the contract. The Statute of Georgia does not affix a certain construction and legal effect to the contract, or impair the validity of any stipulation or condition as between the parties. It did not enter into the contract as an element, and did not affect the rights and obligations of the parties in its inception.

In Harrison v. Sterry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 289, 8 L. ed. 104, it is said: "But the right of priority forms no part of the contract itself. It is extrinsic, and is rather a personal privilege dependent upon the laws of the place where the property lies, and where the court sits, which is to decide the cause." Under the Statute, the reservation of title, if the contract is in writing, is valid against third persons during the thirty days allowed for recording, and is only rendered invalid by a failure to record it within the specified time. Recording, which is to be done subsequent to the contract, is required to make the reservation of title complete against third parties. The omission to record operates in the nature of a forfeiture of the reservation of title as to creditors and purchasers. The question is not one of validity and construction, but of notice by registration and priority of right. The failure to record does not divest the original vendor of the title, but debars its assertion against third parties, conferring on them, if creditors, a lien, and if purchasers, a right, prior and superior to the vendor's reservation of title. The Statute is founded on the local policy of Georgia, different from the policy of this State. Defendant claims no right of property vested under the laws of Georgia, or any right other than that acquired under the laws of Alabama. To maintain the right of defendant to hold the property against the claim of the original vendors would be to make the disposition and transfer of property here situated dependent upon the statute of a sister State, which contravenes the laws and policy of this State,—a statute which may be regarded as remedial in its nature. When the validity and construction of the contract between the parties, their rights and obligations, was determined by the Statute of Georgia, that Statute had no further force. All questions pertaining to the nature and extent of the remedy are governed by the lex fori. Jones v. Jones, 18 Ala. 248; Lewis v. Bush, 80 Minn. 244. Franklin not having had possession of the property in this State for three years before defendant purchased, section 1817 of the Code has no application. McCoy v. Odom, supra.

*1. The term "canvass," as used in section 1459, Comp. Laws, which provides that "any candidate or person claiming the right to hold an office contested, or any elector of the proper county desiring to contest the validity of an election or the right of any person declared duly elected to an office in said county, shall give notice thereof within twenty days after the canvass of the votes for such election," construed to include the decision of a tie vote by the clerk or auditor, as provided by section 23, chap. 84, Laws 1890.

The notice of contest is the foundation of the suit, and performs the double office of a summons and complaint, and should contain the title of the cause, specifying the name of the court and the parties to the contest. Whitney v. Blackburn, 17 Or. 564.

All that the statute contemplates is fair notice of the subject matter of the contest within the time prescribed. Dalley v. Estabrook, 1 Bart. 290.

The county auditor is required to give notice in writing to the clerk of the circuit court to issue a notice to the county commissioners to meet for the trial of the contest, and to notify contestee to appear at the trial. Statement in notice.

Under a statute authorizing any elector to contest an election, he shall within forty days file a statement with the county clerk, specifying that he is a qualified elector, and the notice is sufficient which alleges that he is at the time of filing it such an elector, without alleging that he was such at the time of the election. Minor v. Kidder, 43 Cal. 220.

A notice containing the averment that the board of county canvassers rejected and refused to count the votes cast in certain townships, without showing that this action affected the result, was held a sufficient compliance with the statute. Steele v. Martin, 6 Kan. 430.

Where illegal votes were alleged to have been cast at eight precincts, which could not have been less than eight, and the deduction of these from contestee's majority of three votes would show contestant entitled to the office, the alleged grounds of contest were well stated. Nichols v. Ragdale, 26 Ind. 181.

A ground of contest not specified in the notice cannot be set up on the trial. Gause v. Hodges, Smith, 291.

A notice of an election contest "stating the cause of such contest briefly," within the meaning of the Oregon Statute, is a notice stating briefly the facts or combination of facts which give rise to the right of contest; and this necessarily implies that such facts shall be stated so plainly as to advise the defendant of the "cause" for which his election is contested. *Whitney v. Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the general election held in Brown County on November 4, 1890, three persons were voted for the office of sheriff of that county, two of whom were the plaintiff and defendant herein. On November 10 following the election, a board of canvassers for that county was convened at the county seat of said county, and it proceeded "to open the returns from the various precincts in said county, and make abstracts of the votes," as provided by law, and on November 14 adjourned. This canvass disclosed the fact that the plaintiff and defendant had the highest and an equal number of votes for the office of sheriff. Subsequently, on November 22, the auditor of said county, pursuant to the provisions of section 26, chap. 64, Laws 1890, proceeded "publicly to decide by lot which of the persons so having an equal and the highest number of votes" should "be declared duly elected," and he having by such method decided that the defendant should be declared duly elected, issued to him a certificate of his election as provided in said Act. On the 12th day of December following said election, the plaintiff served upon said defendant a notice in writing that he intended to contest his (defendant's) election as such sheriff, as provided in section 1489, Comp. Laws. On December 15 the judge of the circuit court made an order requiring said plaintiff to show cause why said notice of contest should not be set aside, not having been served within twenty days after the canvass; and on December 19 said order to show cause was heard, and the court thereupon made an order setting aside said notice of contest; to the making of which order said plaintiff excepted, and from it appeals to this court.

The question presented for our decision is: Did the twenty days allowed plaintiff to serve his notice of contest commence to run upon the adjournment of the board of canvassers on November 14, or at the time the tie was decided by lot on November 22, and the defendant declared elected? The determination of this question involves the construction of the term "canvass," as used in section 1489, Comp. Laws. This section, so far as it relates to the question in controversy, is as follows: "Any candidate or person claiming the right to hold an office contested, or any elector of the proper county desiring to contest the validity of an election or the right of any person declared duly elected to any office in said county, shall give notice thereof in writing to the person whose election he intends to contest, within twenty days after the canvass of the votes of such election, which notice shall be served in the same manner as a summons in a civil action." If the term "canvass," as used in this section, is limited and confined to the acts of the county board of canvassers, as constituted plegate v. Eagan, 74 Mo. 258. See Griffin v. Hall, 23 Ala. 149; Stat. Ark. Gen. Elect. Laws 1875, § 12.

What need not be stated.

The complaint or notice of contest must show that contestant received more votes than the other candidate, but it need not show the number of votes cast for each, this being a matter of evidence. People v. Ryder, 16 Barb. 370.

Where blank ballots have been counted for contestee, the notice need not set forth the names of voters who cast them, though the statute requires "the names of all persons objected to," such objection being to the officers counting blanks as votes. Moffatt v. Montgomery, 68 Mo. 162.

It is not necessary to aver that contestants possessed the requisite qualifications for the office. People v. Ryder, 16 Barb. 370.

Where the law permits a contest by appeal to the district court from determination of the board of canvassers, the notice need not state that the appeal is taken. Newton v. Newell, 23 Minn. 529.

The reasons on which the charge of illegality is based, and the names of the voters, need not be given. Weaver v. Given, 1 Brewst. 140; Batturs v. Megary, Id. 162; Gibbons v. Sheppard, 2 Brewst. 1; Thompson v. Ewing, 1 Brewst. 67; Wheat v. Ragdale, 27 Ind. 191; Mann v. Cassidy, 1 Brewst. 11.

The notice of an election contest, under Mo. Rev. Stat., § 5523, stating that certain ballots were illegal because of writing thereon not allowed by statute, need not set out the names of the persons who cast them. Gumm v. Hubbard, 97 Mo. 311.

Sufficiency of notice.

Under a statute requiring service of notice on contestee, a notice is sufficient if supported by proofs which will warrant a recount of the ballots by the district court. O'Gorman v. Richter, 31 Minn. 25.

Where the points specified in the notice are sufficient to apprise contestee of the general nature of the objections made, so as to enable him to meet them, the notice is sufficient. Howard v. Shields, 16 Ohio St. 184.

As the object of a notice of contest of an election is to inform the other party of the substance of the facts relied upon to defeat his claim, certainty is required, but not technical precision of averment, and when the words used therein, taken in their ordinary sense, fairly serve this purpose, it is sufficient. Whitney v. Blackburn, 17 Or. 564.

Time to serve and file notice of contest.

The statement of the grounds of contest must be filed within the time limited, to give jurisdiction of the case. Farlow v. Hougham, 37 Ind. 540.

The requirement that notice shall be given within a designated time after the official count is mandatory. Bowen v. Hixon, 45 Mo. 341; Castello v. St. Louis Circuit Ct. 23 Mo. 273; Wilson v. Luona, 43 Mo. 290.

The notice of contest must be served and filed within thirty days. Whitney v. Blackburn, 17 Or. 564.

The opposite party should have three days' notice of the illegal votes which the party serving expected to prove. Misch v. Mayhew, 51 Cal. 514.

The time of the three days' notice as to illegal votes, to be given before the trial, must be computed by including the first and excluding the last day. Stinson v. Sweeney, 17 Nev. 309.

Where the statute required the determination of the result of the election to be made within ten days after a certain date, but fixed no time for giving a certificate, it was held that contestant had thirty days from the last of the ten days to serve notice of contest. Follet v. Delano, 2 Bart. 113.

Under a statute providing that contestant shall, under section 1, chap. 84, Laws 1890, then, as that board completed its labors and adjourned on November 14, the notice was not served within time, and the order of the court was right; but if, as is contended by appellant, the term "canvass" embraces and includes the further proceedings taken by the auditor on November 22, provided for in section 26 of said last-mentioned Act, then the notice was served in time, and the order of the court below should be reversed. Section 26, referred to, is as follows: "If the requisite number of county officers shall not be elected by reason of two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for one and the same office, the county clerk, whose duty it is to compare the polls, shall give notice to the several persons so having the highest and equal number of votes to attend at the office of the county clerk or auditor, at the time appointed by said county clerk or auditor, who shall then and there proceed publicly to decide by lot which of the persons so having an equal number of votes shall be declared duly elected, and the said county clerk shall make and deliver to the person thus declared duly elected a certificate of his election, as hereinbefore provided." The term "canvass," as used in statutes relating to elections, has not, so far as our researches have extended, received any strictly legal definition, and, as generally understood, its meaning is not very definite or certain. Webster defines the term as a verb, "to examine thoroughly; to search or scrutinize;" and as a noun, "a close inspection to know the state of; as to canvass a vote." Mr. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary (vol. 1, p. 288), defines "canvass" as "the act of examining the returns of votes for public officers. . . . The determination of the board of canvassers of the persons elected to an office is prima facie evidence only of their election." And under the head of "Canvassing Board," in 6 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 810, it is stated: "In nearly all the States the boards of canvassing officers are held to be ministerial officers, whose duty it is to receive returns from the various precincts or counties, as the case may be, and declare the results as shown by the face of the returns." The term "canvass," as used in our statutes, seems to have a broader and more comprehensive meaning than is given in either of the definitions above quoted, and is made apparently to include all the proceedings for determining the result of an election from the closing of the polls to the formal declaration of who are elected. Section 1464, Comp. Laws, provides that "as soon as the poll of the election shall be finally closed the judges shall immediately proceed to canvass the vote given at such election." Section 1, chap. 84, Laws 1890 (being § 1471, Comp. Laws, with a few slight changes), does not contain the term "canvass," but provides that the board, composed of certain county officers therein specified, "shall proceed to open the returns from the various precincts in said county and make abstracts of the votes; . . . and it shall be the duty of the county clerk, or the county auditor, as the case may be, to make out a certificate of election to each of the persons having the highest number of votes, . . . for county or within thirty days after the person is declared elected, file notice of the contest, such notice may be filed at any time before midnight of the last day, regardless of the statutory office hours. Zimmerman v. Cowan, 107 Ill. 631.

Where contestee answers without objecting to the time of service, it is held a waiver of the objection. Todd v. Jayne, 1 Bart. 555.

Where no provision was made in the statute for appointment of a time for appointment of the board of examiners, or for the successful candidate to appear, or for other statutory requirements, the Act is too defective to be carried into execution unless by common consent. Andrews v. Carney, 74 Mich. 278.

A failure to specify the time of the election is fatal to a declaration or notice of contest. People v. Ryder, 18 Barb. 370.

Where the statute requires the contest to be determined at the first term of the court, and notice is given but no court is held, the day specified in the notice is material, and proceedings begun on the first day of the succeeding term cannot be sustained. Adcock v. Leocompt, 66 Mo. 40.

Remedy by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto.

In the absence of statutory provisions for contesting an election, an information in the nature of a quo warranto is the proper remedy. Paine, Elections, § 856, citing People v. Scannell, 7 Cal. 432; People v. Matteson, 17 Ill. 167; Gass v. State, 34 Ind. 426; People v. Stevens, 5 Hill. 616.

Where the statute creates a special tribunal, and prescribes special proceedings for the trial of contested election cases, courts will not take jurisdiction by quo warranto, even in cases of fraud on the part of election officers or candidates. State v. Marlow, 15 Ohio St. 114; State v. Taylor, Id. 187; 12 L. R. A.

Com. v. Baxter, 35 Pa. 263; Com. v. Leech, 44 Pa. 332; State v. Watkins, 1 Rich. L. 43.

Under constitutional provisions.

Under a constitutional provision granting to the supreme court power to issue writs such court has original jurisdiction of the writ of quo warranto in contested election cases. Howard v. McDiarmid, 28 Ark. 100; State v. McDiarmid, Id. 460; Fitch v. McDiarmid, Id. 432; Price v. Page, 25 Ark. 527.

Under a similar provision of the Constitution of Alabama under which the Legislature had established a new judicial circuit providing that the judge should not be required to alternate with judges of other circuits except when he thought it necessary, it was held that the supreme court could entertain an information in the nature of a quo warranto to try the eligibility of an individual elected to that circuit. State v. Williams, 1 Ala. 342; Simonton's Case, 9 Port. (Ala.) 383. See Behols v. State, 56 Ala. 131.

In Wisconsin it is held that the constitutional power to issue writs cannot be taken away by legislation; but that courts may adopt new proceedings adapted to the same end. State v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 118; State v. Foote, 11 Wis. 14; State v. West, Wisconsin B. Co. 34 Wis. 197; Atty-Gen. v. Barstow, 4 Wis. 567; Atty-Gen. v. Blossom, 1 Wis. 317.

Rule in various States.

In Alabama the remedy by procedure in the nature of quo warranto is available only in case of original ineligibility or of an illegal election. State v. Gardner, 43 Ala. 234.

Courts of common law are not deprived by legislation prescribing statutory remedies whereby the same redress may be obtained, unless it is clearly intended to take it away. Moulton v. Reid, 54 Ala. 320.

precinct officers." While, as before stated, the term "canvass" is not used in this section, it clearly appears by section 2 that such county board is a canvassing board, as that section provides that each of the aforesaid abstracts (mentioned in section 1) of the votes made as aforesaid shall be duly signed and certified by the said canvassers under the seal of the said county clerk. It will be further noticed by an examination of section 1 that no provision is made, in direct terms, that said canvassing board shall decide, determine or declare any person elected. Section 3 (relating to members of Congress) provides that "the person having the highest number of votes shall be considered duly elected," and also provides that when there is a tie the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, etc., shall decide by lot which of said persons shall be elected. The proceedings for the canvass of the vote for state officers under section 8 is more full and explicit. The section is as follows: "They shall make an abstract stating the number of ballots cast for such office, the names of all persons voted for, for what office they respectively received the votes, and the number of votes each received, in words at length, and stating whom they declared to be elected to each office, which abstracts shall be signed by the canvassers in their official capacity and as state canvassers, and have the seal of the state affixed." Construing these various sections together as constituting our election system, it seems to us quite clear that the Legislature, in using the term "canvass," in section 1489, intended to include and embrace all the various acts of the canvassing board or officers necessary to fully decide or determine who of the persons voted for should be deemed or declared elected; and that such canvass cannot be said to have been made until that result is reached, or the fact—as in case of a tie of candidates for the Legislature—that no decision can be made except by another election by the people. In other words, that the expression "make out a certificate of election to each of the persons having the highest number of votes," etc., in section 1, "shall be considered duly elected or shall be elected" in section 8, "stating whom they declare to be elected to each office" in section 8, and "which of the persons so having an equal number of votes shall be declared elected" in section 26, were intended by the Legislature to mean substantially the same, namely, the ascertaining who of the persons voted for are deemed, considered or declared elected as shown by the final result of the canvass.

Can it be claimed that, in the case of two candidates for Congress having an equal number of votes, the vote is canvassed when that fact is ascertained, and that the subsequent

In Arkansas the original writ is still maintained, but is not granted on the relation of a private citizen. Ramsey v. Carhart, 27 Ark. 12.

The Supreme Court of California has no original jurisdiction of an action to try title to an office. People v. Harvey, 62 Cal. 508.

Statutory proceedings for election contests are not exclusive of quo warranto proceedings, unless the legislative intent to that effect is clearly expressed. People v. Londoner, 6 L. R. A. 444, 13 Colo. 303.

Provisions substantially similar have been held to create a cumulative remedy merely, and not to inhibit proceedings by quo warranto. See Darrow v. People, 8 Colo. 417; State v. Camden, 47 N. J. L. 64; State v. Kempf, 60 Wis. 470; People v. Hall, 80 N. Y. 117; Hardin v. Colquitt, 68 Ga. 598; State v. Shay, 101 Ind. 26; State v. Adams, 65 Ind. 303; Com. v. Allen, 70 Pa. 465.

As to election contests purely, the statutory remedy directed by the Constitution is exclusive. People v. Londoner, 6 L. R. A. 444, 13 Colo. 303.

The plea of respondent in quo warranto involving the right to office under an election must set up facts showing that he was elected. State v. Anderson (Fla.) June 6, 1890. See State v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 342.

In Indiana, the adoption of a statutory proceeding for the trial of contested election cases will not exclude the remedy by quo warranto in the absence of an express or implied provision to that effect. Barkwell v. State, 4 Ind. 179; Huddleston v. Pearson, 6 Ind. 337; Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 362; State v. Adams, 65 Ind. 303; State v. Gallagher, 81 Ind. 558; State v. Shay, 101 Ind. 26; McGee v. State, 1 West. Rep. 467, 108 Ind. 444.

In Kansas the writ of quo warranto, and the proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto, have been abolished, and the remedies which were obtainable at common law in those forms are had by civil action. Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449, 28 L. ed. 432; Foster v. Kansas, 118 U. S. 305, 28 L. ed. 696.

But as the statute making provision to contest 12 L. R. A.

the election of one declared elected to a county office is inadequate to authorize a removal from office, quo warranto will lie at the suit of one who claims to have received the greatest number of votes for a county office, not only to try the title to the office, but to remove the defendant therefrom as well. Tarbox v. Sughrue, 36 Kan. 225.

In Massachusetts in the absence of statutory regulation the remedy by quo warranto exists. Com. v. Allen, 128 Mass. 303.

In Mississippi it will be allowed only in cases in which it would be granted at common law. Lindsey v. Atty-Gen. 38 Miss. 509.

An unsuccessful candidate cannot maintain a proceeding by quo warranto; although the State may institute a proceeding to oust a usurper. Harrison v. Greaves, 59 Miss. 453.

A quo warranto proceeding is not an election contest in the sense in which those terms are used in the Constitution. It adjudges the right to the office to no one, but simply adjudges an ouster. State v. Francis, 8 West. Rep. 295, 8 Mo. 557.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska has original jurisdiction in an action in the nature of quo warranto to determine conflicting claims to a public office. State v. Frazier, 23 Neb. 433.

A prima facie case must be made to show that where there is fraudulent voting at an election it is at least probable that sufficient false votes were cast to change the result, before an information in the nature of quo warranto will be allowed to test the title of an incumbent to office. *State v. In North Carolina, an action in the nature of quo warranto must be brought in the name of the people; it cannot be brought by an individual in his own name. Saunders v. Gating, 51 N. C. 293. See Davis v. Moss, 51 N. C. 303.

In Ohio, if the prosecuting attorney refuses to proceed the court may substitute another prosecutor. State v. Moffitt, 5 Ohio. 353.

An action in the nature of quo warranto does not lie in the name of the State to determine the title to office. State v. Bowen, 8 S. C. 400.

proceedings by identically the same persons in ascertaining which of the two is elected or "shall be elected" is not a part of the canvass? This case, perhaps, presents the question a little stronger than the one before us, for the reason that there the same board continues, while in this case only a part of the old board continues, although the important member of the board—the one who organizes it—continues.

Returning to the consideration of section 1489, Comp. Laws, it will be observed that an elector can only contest the right of any person "declared duly elected." If the restricted construction of the term "canvass" insisted upon by the respondent is given that section, an elector could not contest the election of any county officer except in case of a tie vote, as the law makes no provision for declaring any officer elected by the county canvassing board. But we apprehend no one would insist upon such a construction, yet there is no doubt such elector could not serve any valid notice of contest in the case of a tie until the person whose right to the office he sought to contest had been "declared duly elected" under section 26, for such are the terms imposed. Can it be, then, that while an elector who seeks to contest in a case of a tie vote must wait until the tie vote is decided, and the person "declared duly elected," before he can give a valid notice, a person claiming the office himself, who desires to contest, may serve his notice before his competitor is declared elected, or it is in any manner determined whether he or his opponent is entitled to the office? We cannot think the Legislature intended to adopt a different rule in the same section as to the event when the time for serving the notice should commence to run in the case of an elector and that of a person claiming the office,—that the time in one case should commence to run from the adjournment of the canvassing board, and in the other from the time it is decided and declared by the auditor who is elected. Such a construction would seem to us to be clearly contrary to the intention of the Legislature, and should only be adopted when the language will admit of no other construction, which we think is not the case here.

Again, it will be noticed that section 1489 provides that the notice of contest shall be given "in writing to the person whose election he intends to contest." What is the meaning of the term "election," as used in this section? Do the law-makers refer to the candidacy of a person for an office,—one who simply claims that he has received the highest number of legal votes for the office? or do they mean the person who has been in some manner decided or declared to be elected? We think the Legislature intended by that term the person actually determined to have been elected. This view seems to be confirmed by the definition of the term "election" by law-writers. Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary (vol. 1, p. 519), defines "election:" "Choice; selection; the selection of one man from amongst more, to discharge the duties in a State, corporation or society." Mr. Anderson, in his Dictionary of Law (p. 394), defines the term: "A choosing or selecting; also the condition of having been chosen or selected; choice or selection." And this term, as generally used, is understood to mean one who has by some legally constituted board been declared elected to an office. We think, therefore, that the expression "the person whose election he intends to contest" is a person who has been decided or declared to be elected by a board or officer authorized to determine the result of the election,—one no longer simply a candidate voted for or subject to be declared elected, but one so declared or decided to be elected, and who has received, or is found entitled to receive, a certificate of his election. It is earnestly contended by respondent that notwithstanding when the board of canvassers, as originally constituted, adjourned on November 14, it had not been determined whether the plaintiff or defendant should be declared to be elected, and the plaintiff did not then know whether or not he would desire to contest the election, as he might by the subsequent proceedings be the person "declared duly elected" yet it was his duty, in order to protect his rights, to initiate contest proceedings by serving his notice of contest within twenty days from the adjournment of such board, although the auditor might not have finally decided the election and declared the result until more than twenty days after the board had adjourned. We cannot accede to this proposition. The time within which the auditor must proceed to decide who shall be declared elected is not fixed or limited by law; and hence it is within his power to delay proceedings, if the construction of the law contended for by respondent is the true one, so as to compel a party awaiting his decision to commence contest proceedings, and thus present the anomaly of a party instituting and prosecuting a suit against an opposing candidate before it is determined whether he or his opponent is elected, or whether or not it will be necessary for him to initiate such a contest, and when the final proceedings of the auditor may result in declaring him elected. Will the law require of one so situated that he serve a notice of contest when such contest may never become necessary, and when he is unable to determine whether or not he desires to make such a contest, or whether he or his competitor will be declared elected? It seems to us no such useless proceeding was intended by our Legislature. As before stated, an elector is authorized to serve a notice of contest within twenty days after the canvass; but he cannot serve it until the person whose election he desires to contest is "declared duly elected." A board adjourns, and, in case of a tie vote, the auditor, on the twenty-first day thereafter, decides and declares who is duly elected. While it is undetermined who is duly elected the elector can serve no notice of contest. Says the respondent to such elector, "The canvass was made more than twenty days ago, hence your time for serving a notice has expired." What becomes of the right of contest of the elector? Is a construction of the Statute that might result in thus depriving the elector of his right to contest permissible except in a case where the Statute is so clear as to only admit of such construction? But in this case the Statute is clear that an elector has twenty days after the result is declared by the auditor, and thus the canvass continues, as to him, until one of the persons who has the highest and equal number of votes is "declared duly elected." If, then, the canvass continues as to him until the result is declared, must it not receive the same construction as to a candidate who claims the office? Will it be seriously claimed that the term "canvass," as applied to an elector, means one thing, but as applied to a candidate claiming the office it means an entirely different thing? That in the one case the canvass is made and concluded only when the result of the election is ascertained by the auditor and the person "declared duly elected," and in the other case when the canvassing board adjourns? We think no such intention can be imputed to the law-makers. It is more reasonable, we think, to say that the Legislature intended that no person having the right to contest should be required to serve a notice of contest until it shall be determined that his competitor had been elected, and so declared. Then his right to contest commences. Then he can properly proceed to institute his proceedings, and take the necessary steps to vindicate his rights.

The views here expressed lead to the conclusion that the order of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Bennett, J., concurs.

Kellam, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur with the majority of the court in the determination of this case. Referring to section 1489, Comp. Laws, as quoted in the opinion of the presiding judge, our disagreement is principally as to the proper interpretation and effect of the expression "the canvass of the votes for such election," for it is within twenty days from that event that notice of contest must be given. I am quite satisfied to accept as a starting point the definition of the word "canvass" as found by the presiding judge in Webster's dictionary, to wit, "close inspection to know the state of;" and, so substituting the definition for the word itself, the expression, with its immediately preceding context, will be, "within twenty days after the close inspection to know the state of the votes for such election;" and this, I think, is precisely the thought the Legislature meant to and did express in said section. The canvass has exclusive reference to something which has already occurred, to wit, the votes cast at such election; and its office and object are to ascertain and "know the state of" such votes. It is provided by section 1484, Comp. Laws, that immediately upon the close of the poll on election day the judges shall "proceed to canvass the vote,"—that is, ascertain the state of,—for to do this they shall (§ 1467) count and ascertain the number of votes cast, and the clerks shall set down in their poll-books the name of every person voted for, written at full length, the office for which such person received such votes, and the number he did receive." The same section provides a form for this statement or return. When completed and certified to by the judges, one of such poll-books is to be inclosed and sealed, and delivered to the county clerk of the county in which such election was held. On or before the tenth day thereafter, the returns being all received by such clerk or auditor (§ 1, chap. 84, Laws 1890), occurs the canvass for the county. The county board of canvassers shall consist of the clerk or auditor, if not a candidate, but, if so, "he shall take no part in the canvass," and two other qualified county officers, selected as provided in said section 1. These officers, called in section 18 of said chapter 84 the "board of canvassers for the county," shall "proceed to open the returns from the various voting precincts in said county, and make abstracts of the votes in the following manner: The abstracts of the votes cast for governor [and other state officers naming them] shall be on one sheet; . . . the abstracts of the votes for the members of the Legislature and of county and precinct officers shall be on one sheet." Section 2 of said chapter then provides that "each of the aforesaid abstracts of the votes made as aforesaid shall be duly signed and certified by the said canvassers, under the seal of the said county clerk or auditor, and shall be deposited in the office of said clerk or auditor." This is all the Statute directs or authorizes the board to do; and, having done this, the board and the canvassers have completed their work, and exhausted their powers as canvassers. The object of the canvass was to ascertain and show the state of the vote. This has been done, the result of the vote fully and particularly exhibited, certified to, signed, sealed and deposited in the clerk's office; and the board is thenceforth functus officio. It then becomes the duty of the county clerk or the county auditor, as the case may be, "to make out a certificate of election to each of the persons having the highest number of votes for members of the Legislature, . . . and for county and precinct officers, respectively, and to deliver said certificate to the person entitled to it," etc. But my brothers are of the opinion that the canvass is not complete until the canvassers have declared somebody elected to the various offices to be filled, which, in my judgment, can only mean that the canvass is not complete until the canvassers have done something which the Statute has not authorized them to do, and which they have no legal power to do. The canvassers in this case, if the Statute is allowed to define their duties, have nothing whatever to do with declaring which candidates are duly elected; and any declaration they might make in this respect would be assumptive and gratuitous. They are to make and certify a statement showing the condition of the vote, and the law itself does the rest by declaring that the person having the highest number of votes is elected. But suppose the law did in defining the duties of the canvassers—as it does in some instances—provide that they should declare which candidates were respectively elected; what would its plain intent and meaning be? Simply that they should declare which candidates, upon the canvass they had so made, had received the highest number of votes, and so were duly elected. It certainly could not mean that they should declare somebody elected in case of a tie, for in such case the law says there is no election. If a decision and declaration by the canvassers that some candidate was duly elected were an essential and indispensable part of the canvass, then, in case of a tie, requiring a new election, there never would be a completed canvass of the votes cast at the first election, for no candidate could be declared elected except as the result of the second election; or perhaps it would more logically follow that the first canvass was still open and incomplete until it included the second election, so that the board of canvassers might be able to declare who was duly elected. This latter conclusion seems palpably unreasonable, but why does it not legitimately and necessarily follow the theory of the majority opinion? The determination by lot is but a substitute for a new election. The proceeding is just as separate from and independent of the first election as a new election would be. Or suppose the law had provided that in case of non-election in consequence of a tie the old incumbent should hold over, then there never would be a completed canvass, for nobody could ever be "declared duly elected." Suppose, upon complaint that the canvassing board in this case when properly organized had refused to make the canvass, mandamus were issued to compel such action, what would the writ command them to do? Unquestionably simply to examine and tabulate the returns as provided in said section, and certify to and file the abstract and a return that they had done this, would, in my judgment, be accepted by any court, as a full and complete answer to the writ. Or suppose, in this very case, the abstract showing a tie vote between appellant and respondent, the clerk had neglected or declined to decide the tie by lot, as required by law; to whom would the mandamus be issued, and who would be commanded to perform this duty,—the board of canvassers or the clerk as an individual and independent officer? I think there could be but one answer to this question.

That the term "canvass" was not intended to and does not include the decision by lot is made more clearly manifest by section 1471, Comp. Laws, changed in phraseology, but not in meaning, by section 2 of said chapter 84, Laws 1890, which provides that "immediately after canvassing the returns and making the abstracts of votes as provided in this section the clerk shall," etc. Now, the decision by lot is not provided for in this section, but subsequently, and still the canvassing is to be done as provided in that section, and all the requirements of that section are fully met long prior to the decision by lot. In my judgment, the canvass thus provided for is nothing more or less than an "official count," and the same proceeding is distinctly so called in the statutes of some of the States; and it was this official count or canvass, completed, verified, signed and filed in the office of the clerk, showing the state of the vote, and that no sheriff was elected because two had received an equal and the highest number of votes, that made it necessary to adopt some other and further proceeding to fill such office; in this case, by statute, a determination by lot; in others, by statute, a new election. This determination by lot was just as separate and distinct from the election as a new election would be. It does not assume to determine who was elected, for it is based by the Statute itself upon the fact that neither was elected. It is simply a plan for deciding who, under the circumstances, shall be "declared elected,"—who shall be deemed or taken to be elected,—precisely as though, under the same circumstances, the law had required the governor to designate which of the two should be considered elected. The board of canvassers is an absolute stranger to the proceeding. In fact, when this drawing takes place, there is no board. It has disbanded, and is defunct. That the drawing is done by the clerk has, in my judgment, no important bearing upon the question. He may or may not have been one of the board of canvassers, and certainly in no case could he be the board itself. The construction of this Statute must be the same if this decision by lot were to be made by some party who could not under any circumstances be a member of the board. I think my brothers feel themselves rather forced into their position by what appears to them the threatening inconsistency of requiring a candidate to give notice of contest before he knows that a contest in his interest will be necessary. He might win in "the decision by lot," and then a contest would be unnecessary. This argument, it seems to me, can only follow a narrow and selfish view of the scope and spirit of the Contest Law. Offices are not created for the benefit of parties who may be temporarily entitled to hold them, nor are elections provided for and held in the exclusive interest of candidates. If, in this contest, appellant is only representing his own individual interest—his personal right to the emoluments of the office—I think it might well be argued that he is now estopped from asserting that he had received a plurality vote, because he had deliberately elected to take his chances with his competitor in a decision by lot, well knowing that such decision could only be resorted to if he had not received such vote. I would find the troublesome inconsistency not where my brothers find it, in the law itself, but in allowing a candidate to participate in a drawing by lot on the sole ground of a tie vote, and then, having lost, to assert there was no tie, but that he was entitled to the office by virtue of having received more votes than his competitor. In People v. Robertson, 27 Mich. 118, the court declined to apply the doctrine of estoppel upon such facts, but plainly intimated that it was because the action was brought by the attorney-general for the people that the conduct of the candidate ought not to estop the people, or preclude inquiry by them into the manner in which their Election Laws had been administered or their elections conducted. In my judgment, such practice can only be tolerated on the theory that the Election Contest Law has a broader purpose and function than simply to secure the personal rights, and protect the selfish interests, of the candidates themselves. The general public, more than any individual candidate or otherwise, has a paramount interest in the honesty and cleanness of election proceedings; and, in contesting the apparent result of an election on the ground that the will of the people has been thwarted by fraudulent votes which ought not to have been counted, other interests are involved, and ought to be considered, besides those of the candidate himself; and while he, as such contesting candidate, is perhaps in position to subordinate public interests to his own by declining to expose the frauds by which the law and the general body of electors have been cheated and wronged until he has unsuccessfully experimented with an easier and cheaper method based solely upon and provided by the law for the solution of an honest tie. I do not think the law should be ingeniously strained or expanded for the purpose of giving him a personal advantage as a reward for so doing.

But let us examine section 1489 more closely. It plainly provides for two classes of contestants: (1) "any candidate or person claiming the right to hold an office contested;" (2) "any elector of the proper county desiring to contest the validity of an election, or the right of any person declared duly elected to any office in said county." To determine the relation of the contestant to these contest proceedings it is necessary, first of all, to ascertain to which of these classes he belongs. Upon this question he leaves the court in no doubt. His notice declares that he was a candidate, and that he claims the office for himself on the ground that he received the highest number of legal votes cast; and he brings this contest on his own motion, and in his own name as plaintiff. Section 1491 provides that "such contest cannot be brought by an elector without the notice is signed by the district attorney of the proper county; or, upon his refusal to so sign said notice of contest, the contest may be allowed by the court or judge thereof." The notice is not signed by the district attorney, nor is the contest brought on leave of court or judge. It is apparent that the contestant belongs to the first class, to wit, "a candidate or person claiming the right to hold an office contested." Dropping out, then, the words which only provide for and apply to the second class of contestants, to which appellant confessedly does not belong, the section reads thus: "Any candidate or person claiming the right to hold an office contested . . . shall give notice in writing to the person whose election he intends to contest within twenty days after the canvass of the votes for such election,"—that is, the votes cast at such election. In this case, what does the appellant assert as the ground of his contest? That he was duly elected sheriff, and claims the office by virtue of having received the highest number of votes, but that the canvassing board, by throwing out the returns from one or more voting precincts, has made it appear that he was not elected. When and how did they so make it appear? By their "canvass of the votes for such election." Then, when must he serve his notice of contest? Within twenty days after such canvass; that is, the canvass which shows he was not elected, when in truth and in fact, as he alleges, it ought to show he was elected. This is his grievance. It occurred then, and then commences to run the twenty days within which he may institute a contest for its correction. Finally, I think the majority opinion is fairly criticisable in this respect: The expression "canvass of the votes" in connection with election proceedings is not an unusual one, and as such has a popular and generally accepted meaning, and was probably so used by the Legislature. I think the opinion invents for and attaches to it a new and unusual meaning, and that, too, for the purpose of making the law cover and control a case not within the contemplation of the law-makers, and perhaps not within the purview of the law itself. The opinion says that an elector cannot serve his notice of contest until a person is "declared elected" and that could not be done in this case until the tie was decided, and consequently the elector must have twenty days from that event in which to serve his notice. But is the proceeding then and thus initiated a contest against "the person whose election he intends to contest?" In the light of the authorities, it can hardly be claimed that respondent received his certificate or is now holding the office because he was elected thereto, or by election, for the Statute only authorizes the "decision by lot" in case he "shall not be elected." I think he holds the office, not by virtue of an election, nor because he was elected, but by virtue of a subsequent and independent proceeding, made necessary by the fact that neither he nor his competitor was elected. As a result of these views, I think the order of the circuit court was right, and should be affirmed.

The Supreme Court of the United States in a amount alleged to be due on a promissory note, which resulted in a verdict in favor of defendant. Sustained.

The note was for $198.72, dated December 8, 1879, and was payable on demand. On its back it bore the indorsement "January 26, 1881. Rec'd $12.80 in work." The writ in this case was dated January 18, 1887.

The principal defense was the Statute of Limitations.

On January 26, 1881, Sawyer was owing the holder of the note a store account and the amount due on the note. On that day he presented such holder bills for work done to the amount of $12.80, with no direction as to which debt the amount of the bills should be applied to. The holder of the note thereupon indorsed the amount of the bills as a credit on the note.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. O. Bradbury, for plaintiff:

The payment is an acknowledgment that the note was an existing one, and operated to destroy the operations of the Statute of Limitations and negatives a presumption of payment for mere lapse of time.

Estes v. Blake, 30 Me. 164.

A debtor owing several debts to the same creditor has a right to apply his payment at the time of making it to which debt he pleases. If he makes a general payment without appropriating it, the creditor may apply it as he pleases.

Starrett v. Barber, 20 Me. 461; Hilton v. Burley, 2 N. H. 198; Buck v. Spofford, 40 Me. 328.

If one of two demands is within the operation of the Statute of Limitations and the other is not, this circumstance does not prevent the ascription of a general payment to the former demand when the debtor has not appropriated it at the time.

Ramsay v. Warner, 97 Mass. 12. See also Pond v. Williams, 1 Gray, 685.

Messrs. Merrill & Coffin, for defendant:

Part payment in order to take the balance of the claim out of the Statute of Limitations must be made under such circumstances as to warrant the inference that the debtor thereby recognized the debt and signified his willingness to pay it.

Pickett v. King, 84 Barb. 193; Jewett v. Pettit, 4 Mich. 508.

When the circumstances do not show that the debtor intended to recognize the debt, and especially where they show that he did not so intend, part payment will not interrupt the running of the Statute.

Bangs v. Hall, 2 Pick. 368; Hale v. Morse, 49 Conn. 481.

Payment, in order to take the claim out of the Statute of Limitations, must be made by the defendant or with his privity. A payment neither intended nor assented to by him will not have that effect.

Where the creditor holds two clear and undisputed debts, neither one is taken out of the Statute by evidence of a part payment not specifically appropriated by the debtor.

series of well-considered decisions has reached conclusions quite in harmony with the current of English adjudication, and upon both principle and authority it is held that the debtor or the party paying money, may, should he so elect, direct its appropriation; but if he fails to give such direction, this right of appropriation devolves upon the creditor. Should he fail to apply the fund in liquidation of some particular debt, the law will make the application according to the equities of the case. It should be added that after a litigation has arisen neither party is at liberty to apply the payment, but the court will, in the furtherance of justice, order the amount credited upon that debt for which the security is the most precarious. *United States v. The creditor does not lose his right of election, although not immediately exercised; but after making it he is bound by it. Alexandria v. Patten, supra.

Neither debtor nor creditor has a right to make an appropriation after a controversy has arisen. United States v. Kirkpatrick, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 720, 6 L. ed. 199; Backhouse v. Patten, supra.

Application of payments must be just and equitable.

No general and uniform rule, applicable to all 12 L. R. A.

cases, can be deduced from the decisions. But the better opinion would seem to be that the application of indefinite payments need not be exclusively in accordance with the interests of either party, but may be such as is just and equitable under all the circumstances of the case. Stone v. Seymour, 15 Wend. 29. See Baker v. Stackpole, 9 Cow. 420; Truscott v. King, 6 N. Y. 147; Allen v. Culver, 3 Denio, 284; Emery v. Tichout, 13 Vt. 15; *Robinson v. Under such circumstances it has been held that the debtor may make application to a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations, or within the Statute of Frauds. Ramsay v. Warner, 97 Mass. 8; Jackson v. Burke, 1 Dill, 311; Haynes v. Nice, 100 Mass. 327; Ayer v. Hawkins, 19 Vt. 23.

But a debtor would not have the right to apply general payments to any debt or item of account which is illegal, or contrary to law, as a claim for usurious interest, or for articles sold contrary to law. Rumsey v. Warner, Jackson v. Burke, Haynes v. Nice and Ayer v. Hawkins, supra.

But if the payment has been made on account of an illegal sale, as for instance of spirituous liquors sold without a license, the purchaser cannot afterwards rescind the payment, and insist upon the application to other debts. Caldwell v. Wentworth, 14 N. H. 431. See 3 Field, Lawyer's Briefs, p. 121.

interrupt the running of the Statute of Limitations thereon.

Royston v. May, 71 Ala. 898; Armistead v. Brooks, 18 Ark. 521.

The doctrine for a time prevailed that the Statute of Limitations was a discreditable defense, and should be upheld by courts only when it was impossible to find a pretext for avoiding its effect.

Wherever this view prevailed the slightest acknowledgment was held by courts to take a case out of the operation of the Statute.

Burden v. McElhenny, 2 Nott & McC. 60, 10 Am. Dec. 570.

Gradually this crude and mistaken view of the nature and purpose of the Statute was abandoned, and the Statute came to be regarded as having its foundation, not on a presumption of payment, but on sound considerations of public policy.

Bell v. Morrison, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 360, 7 L. ed. 178.

Under the influence of this more enlightened view, it is now the law that there must be a clear and unequivocal acknowledgment of the debt to take a case out of the Statute, or suspend its running.

Ibid.; Robbins v. Otis, 1 Pick. 363.

The new promise must be unconditional in order to remove the bar of the Statute or prevent its running; or, if conditional, plaintiff must show that the condition has been fulfilled.

Mumford v. Freeman, 8 Met. 433; Wetzel v. Bussard, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 309, 6 L. ed. 481; Mattocks v. Ohadwick, 71 Me. 818; Perley v. Little, 3 Me. 97; Porter v. Hill, 4 Me. 41; Lombard v. Pease, 14 Me. 849; Thayer v. Mills, 14 Me. 800; Pray v. Garcelon, 17 Me. 145.

A general acknowledgment of indebtedness is not sufficient to take a particular debt out of the Statute.

Clarke v. Dutcher, 9 Cow. 674; Conway v. Williams, 10 La. 563, 29 Am. Dec. 466; Stafford v. Bryan, 3 Wend. 535; Martin v. Broach, 6 Ga. 21, 50 Am. Dec. 803.

The new promise to be effectual must be clear and positive, and must distinctly refer to the debt sued.

Landis v. Roth, 109 Pa. 631, 58 Am. Rep. 747; Hussey v. Kirkman, 95 N. C. 63; Stafford v. Bryan, supra; notes to Whitcomb v. Whiting, Dougl. 653, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 955.

As the reviving effect of part payment is due to the acknowledgment and new promise implied therefrom, nothing is clearer than that the principles just stated which control the efficacy of acknowledgments and new promises should apply also to part payment.

Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 559; Shoemaker

v. Benedict, 11 N. Y. 176; Whitcomb v. Whiting, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. 977.

Even some of the very cases which hold to the doctrine we are condemning have to admit that a payment or acknowledgment which may relate to either of two separate and unconnected debts will throw the burden of proof on the creditor to show which was intended, and leave both within the Statute, unless the uncertainty is removed by further evidence.

Walker v. Butler, 6 El. & Bl. 506; Buckingham v. Smith, 28 Conn. 458.

Walton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The right of a debtor to determine to which of several debts a payment made by him shall be applied is unquestionable; but if he omits to exercise the right, the law allows the creditor to make the appropriation, and the latter may apply it to a debt already barred by the Statute of Limitations. But such an application of it will not remove the statutory bar with respect to the balance of the debt. To have that effect, the appropriation must be made by the debtor himself.

But the creditor may apply the payment to any debt not already barred by the Statute of Limitations, and thereby prolong the running of the Statute for six years from the time when the payment is made.

Apparently this distinction between a debt already barred and one not already barred was overlooked by the presiding judge in the trial of this cause, for the indorsement in question was made on the note declared on long before it would have become barred by the Statute of Limitations; and yet the presiding judge instructed the jury that to take the case out of the operation of the Statute the plaintiff must show that the party making the payment made it and applied it, or made it to be applied, upon the particular contract in suit. This would have been correct if the indorsement had been made upon a note then barred by the Statute. But the instruction, being given with reference to a payment made before the note on which it was indorsed had become barred, was clearly erroneous.

This distinction between debts barred by the Statute at the time when the payment is made and those not then barred, is recognized in Pond v. Williams, 1 Gray, 630, and expressly sanctioned in Ramsay v. Warner, 97 Mass. 8; And the law is so stated in Buswell on Limitations, § 81.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amounts due on certain promissory notes alleged to have been executed for defendant by its president. Affirmed in part. Reversed in part.

Statement by Grant, J.:

This is an action on five negotiable promissory notes, alleged to have been executed by defendant by and through one Stewart Jackson. The plaintiffs were co-partners, engaged in the horse and mule business in Kansas City, and had been for two years prior to the making of the notes sued on. The defendant was a business corporation, organized under the laws of this State, and doing transfer business in Kansas City. On the 21st day of June, 1887, one Stewart Jackson, in payment for certain mules by him bought of plaintiffs that day, gave plaintiffs the following note:

"$1,860.00. Kansas City, Mo., June 21, 1887.

"Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Sparks Bros. and Hancock eighteen hundred and sixty dollars, for value received, at the banking office of H. S. Mills, in Kansas City, Mo., with interest from date at the rate of ten per cent per annum until paid, and, if interest be not paid annually, to become as principal, and bear the same rate of interest. Due Aug. 20, 1887. Despatch Transfer Co., by S. Jackson, President."

And on July 5, 1887, said Jackson, in payment of mules that day bought of plaintiffs, gave plaintiffs the following note:

"$1,840.00, Kansas City, Mo., July 5, 1887.

Hunter, 54 Pa. 380; 1 Lawson, Rights, Remedies and Practice, § 420.

And it is held that a corporation cannot evade liability on negotiable paper, indorsed with its name by its agent, for the accommodation of a third person on the ground that the agent had no authority so to indorse it, where it appears that the agent had frequently before indorsed its paper, and procured it to be discounted by the plaintiff, and received the avails, and that the corporation had recognized the validity of such previous transactions. Bank of Auburn v. Putnam, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 80, 3 Keyes, 343. See Percy v. Millaudon, 3 La. 568; 2 Wait, Act. and Def. 343.

The authority of a corporation or its officers to issue its promissory note need not be expressly given by its by-laws, or by formal resolution of the board of directors. Such authority can be inferred from the acquiescence of the corporation in, or the recognition by it of, the acts of its accredited officers in the regular course of its authorized business. First Nat. Bank of Hannibal v. North Missouri Coal & Min. Co. 86 Mo. 123.

Beyond the powers which usage and custom and the necessities and conveniences of business require in the executive officer of a corporation, the president has no more control over the corporate property and funds than any other director. He may, however, without any special authority from the board of directors, perform all acts of any ordinary nature which are incident to his office, and he may bind the corporation by contracts arising in the usual course of business. To this extent he becomes, in virtue of his election as president, the agent of the corporation. Stokes v. New Jersey Pottery Co. 46 N. J. L. 237; Titus v. Cairo & F. R. Co. 37 N. J. 13 L. R. A.

Corporations, of necessity, must act solely through the instrumentality of their officers or other duly authorized agents; and such officers and agents must, like the agents of natural persons, be deemed to be clothed with all the powers and authority necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of their creation, in the manner, with the means and appliances, and according to the usages customary in the conduct of the business and affairs intrusted to them. Lee v. Pittsburgh Coal & Min. Co. 56 How. Pr. 373.

The views we have expressed not only rest upon good reason, but they are abundantly supported by authority. Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 644, 19 L. ed. 1008, 1018; New Hope & D. Bridge Co. v. Phenix Bank, 3 N. Y. 155; American Ins. Co. v. Oakley, 9 Paige, 466, 4 L. ed. 739; Emmet v. Reed, 8 N. Y. 312; Mumford v. Hawkins, 5 Denio, 355; Bates v. Keith Iron Co. 7 Met. 224; Clarke Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kent County v. Butchers & Drovers Bank, 16 N. Y. 125, 23 N. Y. 426; Wild v. New York & A. Silver Min. Co. 59 N. Y. 644.

The president's authority may be by parol, and collected from circumstances or implied from the conduct or acquiescence of the directors. It may be inferred from the general manner in which he has been suffered by the directors, without interference or inquiry, to conduct the affairs of the corporation; and when, during a series of years or in numerous business transactions, he has been permitted, in his official capacity and without objection, to pursue a particular course of conduct, it may be presumed, as between the corporation and those who in good faith deal with it upon the basis of his authority to represent the corporation, that he has acted in conformity with instructions received from those who have the right to control its operations. Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 28 L. ed. 49.

Where a party deals with a corporation in good faith, and is unaware of any defect of authority or other irregularity on the part of those acting for the corporation, the corporation is bound by the contract, if not ultra vires. Merchants Nat. Bank of Boston v. State Nat. Bank, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 604, 19 L. ed. 1008.

The elementary treatises and authorities establish this view. Story, Ag. ed. 1863, § 87, p. 93.

"Thirty days after date we promise to pay to the order of Sparks Bros. and Hancock eighteen hundred and forty dollars, for value received, at the banking office of H. S. Mills & Son, in Kansas City, Mo., with interest from date at the rate of ten per cent per annum until paid, and, if interest be not paid annually, to become as principal, and bear the same rate of interest. Due Aug. 5, 1887. Despatch Transfer Co., by S. Jackson, President.

"Indorsed: Protest waived. S. Jackson."

On the 11th of June, 1887, said Jackson, for mules bought by him of plaintiffs, gave them this note:

"$300.00. Kansas City, Mo., June 11, 1887.

"Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Sparks Bros. and Hancock three hundred dollars, with 10% interest from date, value received. Due Aug. 10, 1887. S. Jackson."

On June 11th said Jackson, for mules by him bought that day of plaintiffs, gave this note:

"$375.00. Kansas City, Mo., June 11, 1887.

"Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Sparks Bros. and Hancock three hundred and seventy-five dollars, with 10 per cent interest from date, value received. S. Jackson."

And on June 15 this note:

"$240. Kansas City, Mo., June 15, 1887.

"Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Sparks Bros. and Hancock, two hundred and forty dollars, for one mouse-colored mule bo't of C. Sparks, with 10 per cent interest from date, value received. Due Aug. 14, 1887. S. Jackson."

The plaintiffs declare upon each note separately, and charge that the defendant executed all five of the notes, by its president, Stewart Jackson. There is also a sixth count, which is as follows: "(6) Plaintiffs, for another cause of action, state that between the 10th day of June, 1887, and the 16th day of June, 1887, plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, sold and delivered to the defendant certain mules as follows, to wit: On the 11th day of June three (3) mules, for $675.00; on the 15th day of June, 1887, one (1) mule for $240.00; amounting in all to the sum of $915.00; which said sum defendant owes plaintiffs, and fails and refuses to pay the same, although payment has been demanded; wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment against defendant for the sum of $915.00, and for costs."

The defendant, for its defense, denies that it executed either of said notes; denies that it ever authorized the execution of either of said notes; alleges that said notes were given to plaintiffs by said Jackson on his own private account, and that the consideration therefor was certain mules and horses sold by plaintiff to Jackson for his individual account, and in no way connected with defendant's business; that said mules and horses were never delivered to defendant, and were never bought by or for defendant; that Jackson was carrying on a general business buying and selling horses and mules for his own account, which plaintiffs well knew; and that the horses and mules for which these notes were given were bought by said Jackson in the ordinary course of his business, and plaintiffs knew he did not buy said mules and horses for defendant. Defendant set up its charter, showing that by it it was only authorized to conduct a general transfer business in the City of Kansas, moving freight from point to point in said city; that it was never engaged in the business of buying or selling horses or mules, nor authorized anyone to do so for it; that said two notes were wrongfully executed in its name by Jackson; that it had no power to engage in the horse and mule business, and the notes and the trades for said mules were ultra vires; also pleaded especially that by one of its by-laws it was provided: "No debt for a sum larger than $500 shall be contracted in behalf of the company by any officer thereof, without a vote of the board of directors authorizing same." That the debt sued for in the first and second and sixth counts exceeded $500. That said mules were not bought for defendant by said Jackson in the usual routine of business; that they were not needed by defendant for its business; that they were not desired; that defendant knew nothing of their purchase, and its board of directors never authorized their purchase nor the contracting of the debt therefor. This answer was verified by Harry E. Overstreet, secretary and treasurer. The reply was a general denial. The cause was tried by a jury, and resulted in favor of plaintiffs on each count except the sixth.

The facts developed by the evidence are as follows: The defendant was a corporation engaged in the transfer business in Kansas City. Stewart Jackson was the president of the Company. The company, as originally organized, had a capital of $10,000—100 shares. Jackson had the controlling interest—55 shares. Afterwards the stock was increased to $30,000, of which Jackson had 160 shares—a majority of all the stock. Jackson was the president from the beginning until he left, in August, 1887, after the execution of the notes sued on. It also appears that Jackson purchased every mule and horse that defendant ever owned until he absconded; that defendant's business required mules to haul the freight it handled; that, beginning with November, 1885, and ending May 18, 1887, defendants had some thirteen different transactions in mules with plaintiffs or the firm which plaintiffs succeeded, aggregating some $3,000; that in a number of these transactions the defendant gave its note in its name, by Jackson, who conducted all the trades. There was also evidence that the mules were all turned over to defendant's barns. Defendant offered evidence that it did not get the mules; that, although brought to its barns, they were taken out by Jackson, and shipped to St. Louis; that Jackson bought the mules on his own account, and that plaintiffs knew it. Plaintiffs offered evidence that they thought and were informed that the mules were bought by Jackson for the defendant; that when Jackson gave the three notes sued on in counts 3, 4 and 5, they directed him to give the Company's notes to the clerk of plaintiffs in their counting-room, and did not know, till after Jackson had absconded, the notes simply bore his name; that they were selling the stock to defendant. On the trial defendant objected to the introduction of the three notes sued on in the third, fourth and fifth counts, for the reason that they were incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, as they were the individual notes of S. Jackson alone; that defendant was not and could not be bound thereby. The court gave nine instructions for the plaintiff, in which the liability of defendant for the acts of Stewart Jackson, done in its name, was correctly defined. The eighth instruction is as follows: "(8) As to those notes here sued on, executed in the name of S. Jackson, the jury will ascertain whether these were executed for and in behalf of the Company; and if you find that they were so executed, then as to these the defendant is liable thereon to the same extent as if said notes had been executed in the name of the Company." For the defendant the court gave twenty-two instructions, fully submitting all the issues tendered in its answer, that the mules were purchased by Jackson on his individual account, that plaintiffs knew it, and whether the purchases were ultra vires. The court refused the twenty-third instruction, which is as follows: "(23) The jury are further instructed that, even if they should believe from the evidence that at the time of the execution of the notes in controversy, and signed in the name of the defendant Company, plaintiffs in good faith believed that they were dealing with defendant's Company, and yet, while the mules, which in return for said notes were delivered to S. Jackson, remained in his possession, and plaintiffs knew of their whereabouts before disposed of by said Jackson, plaintiffs or their authorized representatives became aware or had reason to know that said Jackson deceived them and misrepresented to them that said mules were for defendant Company, and, notwithstanding such knowledge, made no effort to recover their said mules, but suffered said Jackson to proceed and dispose of the same, then they cannot recover from defendant Company; and in determining these questions the jury should determine from the evidence whether said mules were shipped by said S. Jackson to St. Louis and whether Charlie Sparks was the authorized representative of plaintiffs, and whether he was present at the time of said shipment, or knew of the same in time to have notified plaintiffs and effected a recovery of the mules before they were finally disposed of by said Jackson, if you believe he did dispose of them." The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs on the first five counts of the petition as follows: First count, principal and interest, $1,987.60; second count, principal and interest, $1,909.49; third count, principal and interest, $818.38; fourth count, principal and interest, $891.66; fifth count, principal and interest, $250.40. We also find for defendant on the sixth count of the petition. John J. Granfield, Foreman."

Messrs. Peak, Yeager & Ball, for respondents:

From the previous course of dealing of defendant with plaintiffs, from the powers which defendant at all times allowed Jackson to exercise without let or hindrance, and from the powers which he actually possessed to purchase stock for defendant, plaintiffs were warranted in relying upon his representations in selling and delivering the stock in question, and defendant is bound by those representations.

It was no part of plaintiffs' duty, in the absence of anything exciting their suspicion or putting them on inquiry, to go behind the representations of defendant's chief officer and majority stockholder and investigate the question whether he lied when he stated that the stock was bought for defendant to be used in its business.

Even in those jurisdictions where the courts hold to the most rigorous enforcement of the doctrine that no recovery can be had on a note or bill of exchange against one not named in the instrument, they will not reverse the judgment or order a new trial where recovery was had below on the instrument itself instead of on a common count, which the petition contained, for goods sold and delivered; the two counts being for the same amount and covering the same matter, and the jury having passed upon the merits.

Pents v. Stanton, 10 Wend. 271.

Moreover the doctrine itself here contended for by appellant was always a technical outrage and has been thoroughly exploded and repudiated in this State.

Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. St. Mary's Sem. 52 Mo. 480, and cases cited; Ferris v. Thaw, 73 Mo. 446; Franklin Ave. German Sav. Inst. v. Roscoe Board of Education, 75 Mo. 406; Snider v. Adams Exp. Co. 77 Mo. 525; Bushong v. Taylor, 82 Mo. 660.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The notes sued on in this case were all executed by Stewart Jackson, who was at the time of their execution the president of the defendant below, appellant here. The first two were signed in the name of the Despatch Transfer Company, by Jackson as president; the other three by Jackson, without any reference to the corporation, or any words indicating that he intended to bind anyone but himself. The appellant seeks to avoid liability for any of these notes, but its defense differs, as to the first two, from its defense to the remaining three. Counsel for appellant argues that the evidence did not justify the instructions given for respondents, by which appellant was held liable on the two notes signed with the corporate name. Those instructions, in substance, declared the law to be that if the jury should find that Jackson was the president of the defendant, and that defendant allowed him to act as its purchasing agent in buying stock in the name of the Company, and recognized his act as such by paying his orders given on the Company, or by paying his notes given by him for stock so purchased by him of plaintiffs, then defendant was bound by his acts in purchasing the mules of plaintiffs, and for the notes sued on in the first two counts, unless plaintiffs knew or had reasonable means of knowing that Jackson was buying these mules on his individual account. The power of Jackson to bind the defendant is governed by the Law of Agency. The principle underlying is the same whether the principal be a corporation or an individual. It is now well settled that when in the usual course of the business of a corporation an officer has been allowed to manage its affairs, his authority to represent the corporation may be implied from the manner in which he has been permitted by the directors to transact its business. This is only the application of the principle that usual employment is evidence of the powers of an agent, and the principal is held responsible for the acts of his agent within the apparent authority conferred on the agent. First Nat. Bank of Hannibal v. North Missouri Coal & Min. Co. 86 Mo. 125; Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. St. Mary's Sem. 52 Mo. 480; Kiley v. Prosser, 57 Mo. 890; Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 28 L. ed. 49; Mahoney Min. Co. v. Anglo-Californian Bank, 104 U. S. 192, 26 L. ed. 707.

The president of a business corporation is its chief executive officer. He may, without any special authority from the board of directors, perform all acts of an ordinary nature, which by usage or necessity are incident to his office, and may bind the corporation by contracts in matters arising in the usual course of business. Boone, Corp. § 144; Stokes v. New Jersey Pottery Co. 46 N. J. L. 237.

In the case at bar Stewart Jackson was president of defendant. He purchased every mule that defendant owned from its organization until after the execution of the notes sued on in this case. He had repeatedly signed notes in the name of the corporation, and the corporation had honored his orders and paid his notes so drawn. Plaintiffs had thirteen different transactions with him as the president and purchasing agent of defendant prior to the giving of the notes herein, and his acts had always been ratified. The defendant was engaged in a transfer business in which the motive power was mules, and it was in its written charter privileged to buy mules, and execute its notes therefor. Jackson had purchased mules for defendant of the plaintiffs; and on this occasion he informed them that he was purchasing the mules for which these two notes were given, for the defendant. His transaction, under the evidence, was within both his actual and apparent authority to bind the defendant. The evidence is amply sufficient to bind defendant on these two notes; and there was no error in the instructions given for plaintiffs on these two notes, and certainly defendant ought not to be heard to complain.

The action of the court in admitting parol evidence to show that the defendant was liable on the three notes sued on in third, fourth and fifth counts, notwithstanding its name nowhere appeared on the notes, and in instructing the jury as it did in the eighth instruction for the plaintiffs, presents for our consideration a question of great practical importance, and much depends upon its right decision. The exact question here presented has not been passed on by this court in any case that we have been able to find, but it has been long settled in many of our sister States. In Massachusetts as early as 1814, in the case of Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass. 27, it was held that, "where one makes a written contract, intending to act therein as the agent of another, and to bind his principal, it is necessary that it should appear in the contract itself that he acts as such agent;" and oral testimony was held inadmissible to contradict, vary or materially affect the written contract. The same question came before the same court again in 1868, in Brown v. Parker, 7 Allen, 387. In that case one N. H. Streeter had signed two negotiable notes, and it was sought to hold defendant Parker, on the ground that Streeter was his agent, and intended to bind defendant. The court says: "But in suits on promissory notes or bills of exchange no evidence is admissible to charge any person as principal whose name is not in some way disclosed on the face of the note or draft. This point has been often decided in this Commonwealth, and the reasons on which the rule rests have been fully stated in very recent decisions,"—citing Swanson v. Loring, 5 Allen, 840, and cases cited, in which it was said by Chief Justice Bigelow: "Being negotiable paper, all evidence dehors the drafts is to be excluded. It is wholly immaterial, therefore, that the defendant was in fact the agent of the company named on the face of the drafts, that the plaintiff knew that he was so, and that the defendant had no personal interest in the Company."

In New York, in Pente v. Stanton, 10 Wend. 271, the cases both in England and in the different States of the Union were reviewed, and the conclusion reached "that no person can be considered a party to a bill unless his name or the name of the firm of which he is a partner appear on some part of it,"—citing, Chitty, Bills, 22; Fenn v. Harrison, 8 T. R. 761; Amly v. Lye, 15 East, 7.

And this rule is universally accepted as the law by the recent text-writers on commercial paper. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 87; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 181.

"The reason of this rule is that each party who takes a negotiable instrument makes his contracts with the parties who appear on its face to be bound for its payment. It is 'a courier without luggage,' whose countenance is its passport; and in suits upon negotiable instruments no evidence is admissible to charge any person as a principal thereto unless his name in some way is disclosed upon the instrument itself." 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 808; Mechem, Ag. pp. 285-287; Heaton v. Myers, 4 Colo. 59.

And another good reason for the rule is that every part of commercial paper must be definite and certain and contained in the body of the paper itself, so that every taker and holder understands exactly what his rights in and to it are, and with whom he is contracting. Counsel for respondents claim that this doctrine has been repudiated by this court in a number of decisions, and the importance of the question, and the earnestness with which this is urged, demand that we should state our reasons for declining to take that view of the case.

The leading case relied upon by respondents is Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. St. Mary's Sem. 52 Mo. 480. The note which was the basis of the action in that case was as follows:

"$750.

"For value received in policy No. 2,969, dated the fourteenth day of March, 1866, issued by the Washington Mutual Fire Insurance Company of St. Louis, I promise to pay said company (or their secretary for the time being) the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, in such portions and at such time or times as the directors of said company may agreeably to their acts of incorporation require. Daniel McCarthy, Prest. Per Thomas Burke."

This court held that it was competent to explain the ambiguity on the face of the note itself. Speaking for the court, Judge Sherwood said in that case: "In the present case the note sued on is signed 'Daniel McCarthy, Prest.' But president of what? Just here, under the rules laid down in the above cases, parol evidence steps in, and affords a ready and satisfactory explanation. The word 'Prest.,' attached to the name of Daniel McCarthy, is an ear-mark of the official capacity in which the note was signed,—not evidence, it is true, that the note was signed in that capacity, but a sufficient basis for the introduction of testimony tending to establish that fact." Moreover in that case the note on its face referred to policy No. 2,969, which insured the seminary building and church building belonging to St. Mary's Seminary. It will be observed, first, that the above note is not negotiable, and, secondly, that the ambiguity appears on its face, growing out of the word "Prest.," affixed to McCarthy's name. In the case at bar the notes are by their terms negotiable, and contain nothing but Jackson's name as maker; so that this case is not authority, because the facts are entirely different. It is true, however, that in this case Judge Sherwood quotes from the decision in Mechanics Bank of Alexandria v. Bank of Columbia, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 827, 5 L. ed. 101, in which the Supreme Court of the United States says: "It is by no means true, as was contended in argument, that the acts of agents derive their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency." If this were all, it must be conceded that respondents are justified in claiming that this decision is broad enough to permit parol evidence in any case to explain who was the principal, notwithstanding there is no intimation on the face of the paper that anyone but the agent is a party to it. But the Supreme Court of the United States did not put its decision on that ground; but, on the contrary, Justice Johnson, who delivered the opinion, expressly says: "But the fact that this appeared on its face to be a private check is by no means to be conceded; on the contrary, the appearance of the corporate name of the institution on the face of the paper at once leads to the belief that it is a corporate, and not an individual, transaction; to which must be added that the cashier is the drawer, and the teller the payee, and the form of ordinary checks deviated from by the substitution of 'to order' for 'to bearer.' The evidence, therefore, on the face of the bill predominates in favor of its being a bank transaction. But it is enough for the purposes of the defendant to establish that there existed on the face of the paper circumstances from which it might reasonably be inferred that it was either one or the other, and in such a case to resort to extrinsic evidence to remove the doubt." So that it seems clear that the supreme court placed its decision upon the fact that upon the face of the paper the ambiguity appeared. That court would never have held that there was any ambiguity on the face of the notes sued on in the third, fourth and fifth counts in the case at bar. Falk v. Moebis, 127 U. S. 597, 32 L. ed. 266.

In Smith v. Alexander, 31 Mo. 198, the action was on the following note:

"$500. St. Louis, Mo., July 22, 1855.

Ninety days after date I promise to pay to the order of Messrs. Smith & Co., five hundred dollars, for value received, negotiable and payable without defalcation or discount. J. H. Alexander, Treas. Ohio & Miss. R. R. Co."

In that case Alexander, having been sued on this note, was allowed to show that he was treasurer of the said railroad, and that he gave the note simply as agent of said Company, Judge Ewing saying: "A mere addition to the name of the party signing the contract cannot be regarded as a certain indicium that it was made on behalf of another. Where, however, it is doubtful from the face of the contract whether it was intended to operate as a personal engagement of the party signing it or to impose an obligation on some third person as principal, evidence is admissible to show the character of the transaction." So we see that Judge Ewing places his ruling on the doubt appearing on the face of the note, whether it was the obligation of Alexander or the railroad company.

Shuette v. Bailey, 40 Mo. 69, was an action on a contract for half the value of a partition wall. It was not a negotiable instrument at all, and in that case the contract was signed, "Kenneth McKenzie, Agent for Volney Stevenson, on the first part," so that case is not similar in any legal feature to the one at bar.

In Musser v. Johnson, 42 Mo. 74, action was brought on a written assignment of a certain claim against Johnson and others by

Isaac H. Sturgeon, president North Missouri Railroad Company, "attested with the seal of the company, and countersigned by George H. Blood, Sec'y N. M. R. R. Co." It was held to be the act of the company. The instrument was not negotiable, and the paper on its face clearly showed it was the intention to assign the railroad company's right. The next case we are cited to is Ferris v. Thaw, 72 Mo. 446. In that case the note or instrument read:

"$4,000. St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 8d, 1870.

"Twelve months after date I promise to pay to the order of John W. Luke, treasurer, $4,000, without defalcation or discount, for value received, negotiable and payable at the Third National Bank of St. Louis, with ten per cent interest from date, payable semi-annually. Charlie Thaw, W. M. Polar Star Lodge No. 79. Indorsed: John W. Luke, Treasurer."

In that case the defendants were sued as members of Polar Star Lodge No. 79 of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. Defendant Thaw was its chief officer, with the title of worshipful master. In that case it was shown that the lodge was an unincorporated body; that it had borrowed this $4,000 for lodge purposes. The loan was reported to the lodge and was approved at its meeting, all the defendants voting therefor. It will be observed that in this case the ambiguity appears on the face of the paper, and the court properly permitted evidence to show who were the real principals, and the members of the lodge which received the money were held on it. It is true the learned judge quotes from Story on Agency and uses language that might be construed to include any undisclosed principal; but it is not practicable in every case to go over the entire law, and point out all the qualifications that might be mentioned, and, when the law, as quoted, applies to the controlling facts in the case, it must be understood as referring to those facts. It is clear to us that the learned judge who delivered that opinion had no intention of discussing the proposition now under consideration. The case was placed upon the ground that, the lodge having failed to become a corporation, its members were liable as copartners; and they were all shown to have ratified the act of the worshipful master, and his agency appeared on the paper itself, so that it was unnecessary to discuss the question as to the liability of a person on an instrument to which he was not a party. Martin v. Fenell, 79 Mo. 410; Richardson v. Pitts, 71 Mo. 128.

It remains only to notice Franklin A. German Sav. Inst. v. Roscoe Board of Education, 75 Mo. 408. That was an action on school bond, as follows:

"It is hereby certified that the special school district of the Town of Roscoe, County of St. Clair, State of Missouri, is indebted to —, or bearer, in the sum of $500, payable —. This bond is issued under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature of Missouri entitled 'An Act to Authorize Cities, Towns, and Villages to Organize for Schools with Special Privileges,' Jas. Smanger, Prest.; Henry Swann, Secretary."

Of course, on the face of this bond, it was the bond of the school-district, and no such question as the one at bar was before the court.

In Snider v. Adams Exp. Co., 77 Mo. 525, Snider was the consignee of the lost package, and this court held that, although the package was the property of his sister Louisa, Snider was the trustee of an express trust, and authorized to sue. No question of negotiable paper was involved in the case, so that it will appear from an examination of each of the cases relied on by respondents as sustaining the action of the court in admitting parol evidence to show that Jackson was in fact the president and purchasing agent of appellant, and executed the three notes described in the third, fourth and fifth counts in behalf of said company, that they are all unlike this case, in that in each of them there was some addition, such as "president," "worshipful master," "treasurer," or some title designating an agency on the face of the paper itself, and in such cases the law permits the ambiguity to be explained; and, indeed, in all other contracts except bills of exchange and negotiable promissory notes it is always permissible to show by parol evidence who is the real principal. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 87, and authorities cited. But wherever the cases have been reviewed we think it will be found that, although the rule has been relaxed in those cases where the maker or drawer adds the word "agent," or "president," or the like after his name, yet in negotiable instruments, when the principal's name does not appear, he is not liable on the bill or note as a party to the instrument. Devendorf v. West Virginia Oil O. L. Co. 17 W. Va. 185; Fuller v. Hooper, 8 Gray, 341; Williams v. Robbins, 16 Gray, 77; Pease v. Pease, 85 Conn. 181; Keck v. Sedalia Brew. Co. 23 Mo. App. 187, 4 West. Rep. 887; Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 339.

What we have here said is not in conflict with another equally well-settled rule, that a party may bind himself by another than his true name, where he signs any instrument with intent to bind himself, or signs any name under which he is shown to have held himself out to the world and carried on business. In these cases he is as much liable as if he had signed his true name. Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 339.

With this view of the law, then, we hold the court erred in the admission of parol evidence to show that Jackson executed the three notes sued on in the third, fourth and fifth counts, and in giving instruction No. 8, as prayed by plaintiffs. In regard to the refusal to give the twenty-third instruction asked by defendant, we think the court committed no error. We do not think any such issue was properly tendered the plaintiffs, nor do we think there was sufficient evidence to justify it, if properly pleaded.

We are driven by our views of the law to affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court on the first and second counts, and reverse the judgment on the third, fourth and fifth counts. Hunt v. Missouri R. Co. 89 Mo. 607, 6 West. Rep. 208, and cases cited.

All Judges of division No. 2 concur. Petition for rehearing overruled.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Thomas P. PROCTOR, Trustee under the Will of John T. Hancock, Deceased, Irene A. CLARK et al.

(....Mass.....)

1. The question "who are the heirs-at-law" of a person within the meaning of a Massachusetts will which gives them an estate in a certain event if he is not then living is to be determined by the law of Massachusetts, although the person named is domiciled in another State.
2. The "then heirs" of a person to whom an estate is given, if he is not living on the death of another, are to be ascertained as of the moment of the latter's death.
3. A widow is an "heir" of her husband to the extent of $5,000 up to which she is given an estate in fee by Stat. 1890, chap. 311, but not in respect to the life estate given by Gen. Stat., chap. 90, § 15, Stat. 1854, chap. 406, § 1, which is a purely optional interest in lieu of dower. Consequently she can take only the sum of $5,000 under a will in favor of his "heirs."

(May 19, 1891.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County (Holmes, J.) for the opinion of the full court of a bill filed by the trustee under the will of John T. Hancock, deceased, for instructions how to proceed in the final distribution of the trust property under the third clause of the sixth item of the will.

NOTE.—Heirs-at-law; significance of the term.

The term "heir" has a very different signification at common law from what it has in those States and countries which have adopted the civil law. In the latter, the term applies to all persons who are called to the succession, whether by the act of the party or by operation of law. The person who is created universal successor by a will is called the testamentary heir; and the next of kin by blood is, in cases of intestacy, called the "heir-at-law," or heir by intestacy. The executor of the common law is in many respects not unlike the testamentary heir of the civil law. Again, the administrator in many respects corresponds with the heir by intestacy. By the common law, executors—unless expressly authorized by the will—and administrators have no right except to the personal estate of the deceased; whereas the heir by the civil law is authorized to administer both the personal and real estate. 1 Brown, Civ. Law, 344; Story, Conf. L. § 608; 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. title Heir.

A person who is appointed by the law to take the estate is called the heir. Technically one who takes property under a will is not an heir; and the word "heir" is also confined to those persons who take the real estate. One cannot be an heir to personal property. Bacon, Law Tracts, 128; Co. Litt. 191 a, note 77; Donahue's Estate, 36 Cal. 339; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 668.

As intestacy is presumed until the will is produced, the heir is relieved from the burden of proving that his ancestor died intestate. Baxter v. Bradbury, 20 Me. 290; Stephenson v. Doe, 8 Blackf. 508; Lyon v. Kain, 36 Ill. 988.

The word "heirs," when unexplained or uncontrolled by the context or by other provisions, has a technical meaning which may not be departed from (Clarke v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466), but it is often 12 L. R. A.

The principal question in the case was whether the entire fund belonged to Irene A. Clark, sister of Charles Henry Hancock, deceased, or whether Lydia A. George, widow of said Charles Henry Hancock, was entitled to share in it.

Messrs. Marshall, Hamblett & Burke and George J. Burns, for Irene A. Clark:

The language of the will imports a gift of both real and personal estate made in the same words, and in a gift of real and personal estate made in the same words, but one construction will be given, and that construction will be such as is proper in respect to a gift of real estate.

Clarke v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466; Lombard v. Boyden, 5 Allen, 255; Fabens v. Fabens, 2 New Eng. Rep. 880, 141 Mass. 400.

The above rule is not varied by the fact that no real estate is included in the trust property at the date of the widow's decease.

De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir, 8 H. L. Cas. 524, and cases before cited.

When the testator uses the same words in his will more than once, they must receive the same construction in each case.

2 Jarman, Wills, 5th Am. ed. 61, and note 1; Lloyd v. Rambo, 35 Ala. 709; Carter v. Bentall, 2 Beav. 551.

The plaintiff, as trustee under the will, was vested with all the property constituting the trust estate. He had a fee in the real estate, and the legal title to the personal property during the lifetime of the testator's widow.

used in a different sense, as meaning only children or issue (Ellis v. Essex Merrimack Bridge Props., 2 Pick. 343; Bowers v. Porter, 4 Pick. 196); it is, in all cases, a question of intention. Haley v. Boston, 108 Mass. 576.

As no one can be the heir of a living person, and as the persons who will be heirs are uncertain while the ancestor lives, a devise to them as heirs, in the proper sense of the term, cannot take effect, and is therefore void. This is obviously so, if the devise be of a present estate, which must vest, if ever, as soon as created. Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 413.

A devise of property to be equally divided among "heirs" naming each child, but describing the grandchildren only as the children of a deceased son, means that the latter are collectively entitled only to the share which their father would have taken. Eyer v. Beck, 14 West. Rep. 232, 7 Mich. 179.

In a will giving testator's daughter a certain sum of money on arriving at the age of twenty-one years or the day of her marriage, but "if she should die without legal heirs or before she reaches twenty-one years," her share shall go to his mother, brothers and sisters, the term "legal heirs" means child or children. Underwood v. Robbins, 117 Ind. 306.

A remainder to "lawful heirs" after a devise for life vests in those who were testator's lawful heirs at the time of his death, and not at the death of the life tenant. Re Tucker's Will (Vt.) Jan. 6, 1891.

In a gift of personality to one for life and at her death to her heirs, the word "heirs" is not a word of limitation, but indicates the class in whom ownership is vested subject to the life interest. Pillot v. Landon, 46 N. J. Eq. 310.

Those technical words which in a deed are absolutely necessary to the creation of particular es-

Perry, Tr. 293, 316; Doe v. Field, 2 Barn. & Ad. 564; Seare v. Russell, 8 Gray, 86; 1 Redf. Wills; Cleveland v. Ballet, 6 Cush. 407.

Charles Henry Hancock was never seised or possessed of any interest in the trust estate.

2 Washb. Real Prop. p. 609 et seq.; Colby v. Duncan, 139 Mass. 398; Kimball v. Lancaster, 60 N. H. 278; Smith v. Rice, 180 Mass. 441, 442.

The trustee being vested with the whole estate during the lifetime of the testator's widow, the vesting of any interest in the trust property which might remain upon the death of his wife was postponed until her decease.

Kimball v. Lancaster, supra; Knowlton v. Sanderson, 2 New Eng. Rep. 100, 141 Mass. 323.

Charles Henry Hancock never had any contingent or transmissible interest in said trust property; his interest was at most that of a mere or naked possibility.

Putnam v. Gleason, 99 Mass. 455; 4 Kent, Com. 6th ed. 208.

The gift is an original, independent gift to the "heirs-at-law" of Charles Henry who might be living at the decease of the life tenant.

The words "heirs-at-law" are technical words, having long since acquired a definite legal signification, and must be construed according to their well-defined legal meaning; and the testator will be presumed to have used them in their strict technical sense, unless there is something in the context of the will which satisfies the court that the testator used them in a different sense.

Putnam v. Gleason, 99 Mass. 456; 2 Jarman, Wills, 61, 62; Harvey v. Olmstead, 1 N. Y. 489; Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 418; Guthrie's App. 37 Pa. 93; 2 Redf. Wills, p. 67, and note (86); Haley v. Boston, 108 Mass. 576, 579; Wilkins v. Ordway, 59 N. H. 878; Pub. Stat. chap. 3, § 3, cl. 3.

When the word "heirs" is used in a will, not to denote succession but to describe a legatee, and there is no context to explain it otherwise, the natural and ordinary sense of the word "heirs" should not be departed from.

2 Lomax, Executors, 21; Wallace v. Minor, 86 Va. 550.

The reason for special or peculiar interpretation of the word "heirs-at-law" fails altogether where the limitation is of a future estate.

Lombard v. Boyden, 5 Allen, 254; Campbell v. Rawdon, supra; Richardson v. Wheatland, 7 Met. 169; Irvine v. Newlin, 68 Miss. 193.

In a gift of real and personal estate to "heirs-at-law," that term means relations by blood.

Putnam v. Gleason, supra; Merrill v. Preston, 135 Mass. 451; Cummings v. Cummings, 6 New Eng. Rep. 123, 146 Mass. 501, 507; Wilkins v. Ordway, supra.

The term "legal heirs," or "heirs," when used in a technical sense does not include the widow.

Lombard v. Boyden, supra; Lord v. Bournes, tates are not required in a devise. Jenkins v. Clement, 1 Harp. Eq. 73, 14 Am. Dec. 698; Peyton v. Smith, 4 McCord, L. 476, 17 Am. Dec. 758; Boone, Real Prop. § 361.

Descent of real property.

The descent of real property is governed by the law of the place where the land is situated, the lex loci rei sitæ. The law of the domicile, lex domicilii, does not apply to real property. And that Law of Descent governs which was in force at the decease of the ancestor. The Law of Descent varies according to the civil polity of each State, or, as Blackstone has it, it is "the creature of civil polity and juris positivi." In every State of the American Union there is a statute regulating the descent of real property, and for any special question arising under the Law of Descent reference must be had to the Statute of the State in which the land lies. But these statutes have many points in common, and are controlled by certain general principles which may be collated and presented in the various text books on real property. But for the minor details of the law, the inquirer must look to the state statutes, an excellent compendium of which may be found in volume 8 of Mr. Washburn's Treatise of the Law of Real Property, p. 21 et seq. Story, Conf. L. § 434; Potter v. Titcomb, 23 Me. 300; Smith v. Kelly, 23 Miss. 167; Miller v. Miller, 10 Met. 393; Marshall v. King, 24 Miss. 36; McGaughey v. Henry, 15 B. Mon. 383; Jones v. Marable, 6 Humph. 116; Price v. Tally, 10 Ala. 946; Eslava v. Farmer, 7 Ala. 543.

The word "heirs" generally denotes succession.

In general, where there is a gift to a person or his heirs, the word "heirs" denotes succession or substitution, the gift being primarily to the person named, or, if he is dead, then to his heirs in his place. In such cases it has often been held that the word "heirs" should be construed to mean the persons who would legally succeed to the property. 12 L. R. A.

according to its nature or quality; and that the heirs-at-law would take the real estate, and the next of kin or persons entitled to inherit personalty would take the personal estate. Such were the cases, among others, of Kaye v. Bolton, 8 T. R. 133, 134, and Wingfield v. Wingfield, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 653, of Vaux v. Henderson, 1 Jac. & W. 383, and of Doody v. Higgins, 9 Hare, App. 82.

But where the gift is directly to the heirs of a person, as a substantive gift to them of something which their ancestor was in no event to take, this element of succession or substitution is wanting, and the heirs take as the persons designated in the instrument to take in their own right; and in such cases the courts have usually held that the word "heirs" must receive the meaning which it bears at common law, as the persons entitled to succeed to real estate in case of intestacy. De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir, 3 H. L. Cas. 524; Forster v. Sierra, 4 Ves. Jr. 766; Swaine v. Burton, 15 Ves. Jr. 305; Mounsey v. Biamire, 4 Russ. 384.

This distinction was recognized in Massachusetts in Clarke v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466, 469, where the court, in speaking of the word "heirs" as used in the will then under consideration, said: "It was not intended to denote succession, that is, to vest the estate in the legatees as successors of or substitutes for the sons of the testator, so that they would take the same estate in nature and quality as that which would have come to them by descent. They are to take by force of the will as purchasers. The word is used to designate the persons who are to take the real and personal estate as independent objects of the gift. It is therefore to be interpreted as a mere term of description of a class of persons who . . . are to take the estate."

The weight of authority and the better reason favor the giving of a strict construction of the word "heirs," and this has been the manifest tendency in Massachusetts and in other jurisdictions. Fabens v. Fabens, 3 New Eng. Rep. 330, 141 Mass. 395. See also Merrill v. Preston, 135 Mass. 451; Lom-

63 Me. 379; Buck v. Paine, 75 Me. 582; Unfried v. Heberer, 68 Ind. 68, 72; Tillman v. Davis, 95 N. Y. 17; Richardson v. Martin, 55 N. H. 45.

Even when a widow is given by statute a portion of her husband's real estate in fee, she is not thereby made his "heir" in the general sense in which that term is usually used and understood.

Unfried v. Heberer, supra; Acts 1880, chap. 211; Pub. Stat. chap. 124, §§ 1, 3.

The trust fund in question did not vest until the decease of the testator's widow, and only those who sustained the relations of "heirs-at-law" at the time the estate vested in possession can share in this estate.

1 Redf. Wills, p. 392; Sears v. Russell, 8 Gray, 86.

At the time of the decease of the testator's widow, the only person who sustained the relation of "heir-at-law" to Charles Henry Hancock was his sister, Irene A. Clark. If the defendant Lydia A. George ever sustained that relation, she had ceased to do so long before the death of the testator's widow by marrying again.

Com. v. Powell, 51 Pa. 488; Blodgett v. Brinsmaid, 9 Vt. 27, 30; Paddock v. Wells, 2 Barb. Ch. 381, 5 L. ed. 668. See also Daggett v. Slack, 8 Met. 450; Bassett v. Granger, 100 Mass. 848; Rand v. Sanger, 115 Mass. 124.

If, under any view of the law and facts, it shall be held that the defendant George was, on the decease of the testator's widow, one of her former husband's "then heirs-at-law," in the sense in which the testator used that term, and as such heir is entitled to anything in this trust estate, her interest therein must be limited to an amount not exceeding $5,000 in value.

Watson v. Watson, 150 Mass. 84; Lincoln v. Perry, 4 L. R. A. 215, 149 Mass. 368, 374.

Messrs. Causten Browne and J. Henry Taylor, with Mr. Millard F. Bowen, for Lydia A. George:

Upon the death of the testator's widow, the heirs of Charles Henry Hancock took this fund as purchasers under the will of John T. Hancock, and not by descent from him. The property passed, not as the estate of Charles, but as the estate of his brother, to those persons who should be heirs of Charles at his decease and upon the testator's widow's decease.

Barton v. Bigelow, 4 Gray, 358; Upham v. Emerson, 119 Mass. 509.

A distinction has been made between the significance of the word "heirs" when used in conveyances or devises of real estate, and when used in reference to personal estate. As to the former, it has been held that it refers to heirs proper; and if the intent be to designate those only who are strictly heirs, it should be clearly so stated.

Clarks v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466; Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257; Merrill v. Preston, 135 Mass. 451.

After this "trust fund" was transformed, under power in the will, entirely into personal securities, and at the time of the death of tes-tor v. Boyden, 5 Allen, 249; Loring v. Thorndike, 5 Allen, 257.

The rule in Shelley's Case.

The celebrated rule in Shelley's Case enforces the proposition that the word "heirs," as used in its technical sense, must be construed as meaning that the distribution is affected by the methods anciently in vogue under the common law. But resort may be had to the contrary to show that the term as employed by the testator is merely descriptive of persons, and where this occurs the question naturally arises, What persons were intended to share in the testator's bounty? Similarly it may be affirmed, that where the context of a will shows that the word "heirs," as employed by the testator, was intended to embrace children of certain parentage, the will must be so construed as to effectuate this intent. Fahney v. Holsinger, 65 Pa. 388; Hinton v. Milburn, 23 W. Va. 166; Stuart v. Stuart, 18 W. Va. 675; Bland v. Bland, 103 Ill. 12; Berg v. Anderson, 72 Pa. 87; Haverstick's App. 106 Pa. 394; Bradlee v. Andrews, 137 Mass. 50; Lockwood's App. 4 New Eng. Rep. 579, 55 Conn. 187. See note appended to the case of Vanolinder v. Carpenter (Ill.) 2 L. R. A. 455; also Boston Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Coffin (Mass.) 8 L. R. A. 740.

There is a growing tendency on the part of the American court, when called upon to place a construction upon this word and determine the particular class of individuals who are entitled to a benefit under it, to rely in part at least upon the species of property bequeathed. Thus, a bequest of personal property "to heirs," is construed to include those only who would be entitled under the Statutes of Distribution, while a bequest of real estate, or of a mixed estate consisting of an amalgam of realty and personalty, is regarded as a gift to those who would be entitled to inherit the testator's real property. Hackney v. Griffin, 6 Jones, Eq. 363; Tillman v. Davis, 95 N. Y. 17; Nelson v. 12 L. R. A.

Rule as established in the New York courts.

The word "heirs" is not necessary in New York to create or convey an estate in fee, nor does its use distinguish a fee-simple absolute from a defeasible fee or a conditional fee. The distinction must be made and sought in words of defeasance or of condition. 1 Rev. Stat. 749; 2 Rev. Stat. Banks' 6th ed. 1130, § 1, 722, 1100, § 2.

A gift, by will, of personal property to the "heirs" of any person in the event of his death is a gift to those who, if such person died intestate, would succeed to his personal property according to law, unless the "heir-at-law" is the person "designated" in the will to take the personal property. Holloway v. Holloway, 5 Ves. Jr. 399; Vaux v. Henderson, 1 Jac. & W. 389, note; Gittings v. Modermott, 2 Myl. & K. 69; Jacobs v. Jacobs, 16 Beav. 557; Low v. Smith, 2 Jur. N. S. 344; *Doddy v. Cas. 524; Re Boote, 1 Drew. & S. 223; Clarke v. Cordis, 4 Allen, 466.

tator's widow, the trustee was bound to treat it all as personality, and to distribute it as in White v. Stanfield, 6 New Eng. Rep. 56, 146 Mass. 424, where it was held that the term "heirs-at-law" meant next of kin, or persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions relating to personal estates.

The word "heirs" when used in a gift of personality, refers primarily to those who would be entitled to take under the Statute of Distributions.

Houghton v. Kendall, 7 Allen, 72; Sweet v. Dutton, 109 Mass. 589; Merrill v. Preston, 185 Mass. 455; Lavery v. Egan, 8 New Eng. Rep. 439, 143 Mass. 839.

The fact that Charles Henry Hancock died before testator's widow does not affect Mrs. George's claim, because his death was contemplated by testator, and provided against in the will; and the same persons who were in the mind of the testator at the time of his making the will cannot be changed by the death of his brother before his widow's death.

Watson v. Watson, 150 Mass. 84, does not touch this case; there the tenant for life of real estate being in possession, the widow's claim was not upheld, because her husband died with only a vested remainder.

Lincoln v. Perry, 4 L. R. A. 215, 149 Mass. 368, is distinguished from the case at bar, for there was no trustee, with authority to sell and convert into personal securities, appointed by that will,—and it was not contemplated in that will that the estate should be divided as existing in the trustee's hands at the time of the death of testator's widow.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill for the construction of a clause in a Massachusetts will, which clause is the final disposition of a trust of the residue of the testator's estate, "real, personal and mixed" and is as follows: "8d. Upon the decease of my said wife, then to pay and convey in fee all the trust property, as it then exists, to my said brother, Charles Henry Hancock, if then living, but if he is not then living then to convey the same in fee to his then heirs-at-law,—whereupon this trust shall end." The testator's widow is dead. Charles Henry Hancock died before the testator and the question is, Who take as his heirs-at-law? More specifically the question is whether the whole fund goes to his sister Irene Clark, or whether his widow, now Lydia A. George, is entitled to any and what share.

The trust fund consisted of both real and personal estate at the time of the testator's death, and is contemplated as including land by the will. This fact, the use of the words "convey in fee" and the use of the similar phrase, "convey the same in fee to his then heirs-at-law" in the fifth section of the will, which deals only with land, show that "heirs-at-law" must be construed to mean those who would be entitled to succeed to real estate in case of intestacy. Lincoln v. Perry, 149 Mass. 368, 378, 4 L. R. A. 215; Fabens v. Fabens, 141 Mass. 395, 399, 2 New Eng. Rep. 890; Merrill v. Preston, 185 Mass. 451.

The facts that the trustee is to convey the property as it then exists, and that he had power to sell and had sold the land, are not sufficient to distinguish this case from the foregoing and to bring it within White v. Stanfield, 146 Mass. 424, 6 New Eng. Rep. 56; Codman v. Krell, 153 Mass. 214; Kendall v. Gleason, 153 Mass. 457.

Charles Henry Hancock died domiciled in Minnesota, but it has been decided that the words under consideration must be taken to mean those who would be entitled by Massachusetts law to succeed to land in Massachusetts. Lincoln v. Perry and Codman v. Krell, supra.

Again, the words mean those who would have been entitled if Charles Hancock had died at the moment appointed for the conveyance, that is, at the death of the testator's widow on January 6, 1890. The gift is to Charles Hancock's "then heirs." The word "then" takes the case out of the general rule illustrated by Dove v. Torr, 128 Mass. 38; Abbott v. Bradstreet, 3 Allen, 587, and Whall v. Converse, 146 Mass. 345, 5 New Eng. Rep. 823, and brings it within the exception established by Knobton v. Sanderson, 141 Mass. 323, 2 New Eng. Rep. 100; Fargo v. Miller, 150 Mass. 225, 5 L. R. A. 690; Wood v. Bullard, 151 Mass. 325, 335, 7 L. R. A. 304; for qualifying "heirs" as it does it can only mean heirs ascertained as of that time.

It follows that we must look to Pub. Stat., chap. 124, § 8, in order to ascertain whether the widow falls within the words of the will. If her husband had died intestate and had left no issue living she would have taken his real estate in fee to the amount of $5,000. To that extent at least under our decisions she is an heir-at-law. Lavery v. Egan, 143 Mass. 389, 3 New Eng. Rep. 439; Lincoln v. Perry, 149 Mass. 368, 374, 4 L. R. A. 215; McMahon v. Gray, 150 Mass. 289, 290, 5 L. R. A. 748. Novo jure sunt heredes omnes qui ex senatus consultis aut ex constitutionibus ad hereditatem vocantur. Dig. 5, 3, 8.

The fund is given as one whole to the heirs. Therefore, when it is settled that the widow is an heir, the will gives her a share in the whole fund and not merely in such part as happened to be land at the testator's death. But we must look to the Statutes of Descent to determine the proportion which will come to her as well as to discover whether she is one of the donees. "A devise to heirs designates not only the persons who are to take, but also the manner and proportions in which they take." Cummings v. Cummings, 146 Mass. 501, 507, 6 New Eng. Rep. 128; Rand v. Sanger, 115 Mass. 124, 128; Holbrook v. Harrington, 16 Gray, 103, 104; Houghton v. Kendall, 7 Allen, 72, 77, 78; Lavery v. Egan, supra; Bullock v. Downes, 9 H. L. Cas. 1, 14, 23, 30.

It is clear, then, that she takes $5,000. Her right to that amount would have vested at once upon her husband's death and would not have been divested by her subsequent marriage. See Foster v. Fifield, 20 Pick. 67, 70. But the fund is stated to amount to $21,000, and the question remains whether she is "entitled during her life to one half of the other real estate," here represented by the rest of the fund, according to the further provision of Pub. Stat., chap. 124, § 8. The answer depends on whether she is to be regarded as an heir in respect of this life interest as well as of what she gets in fee.

Undoubtedly there is nothing in the nature of things to prevent the inheritance, status or estate of an ancestor being continued by more than one successively as well as conjointly. When the inheritance descended to several persons as parceners they were said to be but one heir to their ancestor. Year Book 20 Edw. I. 200, 226; Litt. § 241; Dyer, 29 a, pl. 194. In like manner it was said that "he in the reversion and this particular tenant are but one tenant." Brooker's Case, Godbolt, 876, 877; Co. Litt. 49 a, b, 148 a; Wing, Max. 55, pl. 3, 118; Haynes v. Boardman, 119 Mass. 414. The continuity of person or fictitious identification of heir and ancestor (Day v. Worcester, N. & R. R. 15 Mass. 302, 307, 306) is reconcilable with either form of internal subdivision. The persona is one, although the individuals sustaining it are different. It may follow from Sears v. Sears, 121 Mass. 267, that a widow in possession claiming her statutory interest would stand better for the purpose of acquiring a title by prescription or adverse possession by tacking the time of her adverse use or occupation to that of her husband, than one having only a right of dower unassigned was held to do in Sawyer v. Kendall, 10 Cush. 241. To that extent there might be sufficient privity or partial identification between them, as there is between vendor and purchaser. Leonard v. Leonard, 7 Allen, 277.

But, on the other hand, the notion of heir always has been that of one on whom the law casts an estate of inheritance immediately on the death of the owner. Lavery v. Egan, 148

Mass. 389, 392, 3 New Eng. Rep. 439; Co. Litt. 7 b. The takers of the life estate heretofore created by the common law or by statute on the owner's death, such as dower, curtesy or homestead are not heirs. The life estate in question, although now given the widow by the same section of the Public Statutes which gives her the fee up to $5,000, comes from a different statute and is given with a different end. The fee is given her by Stat. 1890, chap. 211; the life estate by Gen. Stat., chap. 90, § 15, Stat. 1854, chap. 406, § 1. The latter is a purely optional interest in lieu of dower and is substantially equivalent to the "estate by the curtesy or other life interest" given the husband by Pub. Stat., chap. 124, § 1.

In Sears v. Sears, 121 Mass. 267, the Statute of 1854 is said to be a modification of the Statute of Descents. The suggestion was not necessary to the decision. But whether it be true or not of the first section, as no doubt it is of others, plainly the court did not regard the widow as an heir, inasmuch as they said that immediately on the death of her husband she becomes a tenant in common with his heirs. So, in Pub. Stat., chap. 124, § 10, a widow having an undivided life interest by the provisions of law is contrasted with the heirs; "if her right is not disputed by his heirs" the interest may be assigned to her, etc.

Taking these considerations into account and also that so far as we know the contrary was never argued in this case or any other, we are of opinion that we cannot extend the principle of Lavery v. Egan to the widow's life interest, and therefore that she takes only $5,000.

Decree accordingly.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

Frank T. COPP, Appt.,

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE R. CO.

(43 La. Ann.....)

* 1. A legal or equitable right under state laws may be prosecuted before state courts, and, when the parties reside in different States, before federal courts, subject to this qualification, that, when a right arises under a law of the United States, Congress may give the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction.

2. If an Act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved, without specifying a remedy therefor, it may be enforced in a state court; but if a right is conferred by statute, or a specific remedy is provided, or a new power and means of execution are granted, the right can be enforced only in the mode prescribed by the Act.

3. A party who seeks damages, alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the violation by a common carrier of the Interstate Commerce Law, as the Act provides for redress by procedure either before the commission, or by suit before the federal court, cannot bring suit before the state court, which is without jurisdiction to enforce the right, but is relegated exclusively to the commission or the federal court; otherwise, the party would have a third alternative or mode of redress, not contemplated by the Act, by which he is restricted to one of two remedies.

NOTE.—Concurrent jurisdiction of federal and state courts.

The power of Congress to constitute inferior courts endows it with the power to define their jurisdiction. De Groot's Cases, 7 Ct. Cl. 2.

Though the sovereignties of the general and state government are distinct, and neither can interfere with the proper jurisdiction of the other (Ableman v. Booth, 62 U. S. 21 How. 506, 16 L. ed. 169), yet concurrent jurisdiction with state courts is given by the Judiciary Act to the circuit courts of the United States in any suit at law or in equity. See Judiciary Act Sept. 24, 1789; 1 Stat. at L. 73; Rev. 12 L. R. A.

Stat. § 629; Act March 3, 1875, as amended in 1887, 1888; 25 U. S. Stat. 433.

Rights, whether legal or equitable, may be asserted in either the federal or state courts, subject, however, to the qualification that where a right arises under a law of the United States, Congress may, if it sees fit, give to the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. See The Moses Taylor, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 429, 18 L. ed. 401; Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 324, 4 L. ed. 104; Ex parte McNeil, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624.

When a right is given by statute and a specific remedy is provided, or a new power is granted and

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans dismissing his complaint filed to recover damages for unlawful discriminations against him in the rates for transporting coal, contrary to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. B. R. Forman, for appellant:

The state courts have jurisdiction (concurrently with the United States circuit courts) of all suits of a civil nature, when the amount in dispute exceeds $2,000, arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the Act to Regulate Commerce as one of those laws.

Friedlander*, 104 U. S. 570, 26 L. ed. 818; Goodrich v. Wilson, 119 Mass. 429; Kidder v. Horrobin, 72 N. Y. 159; Clark v. Boing, 3 Fed. Rep. 83; Saunders v. Taylor, 6 Nova Scotia, 520.

Messrs. Bayne, Denegre & Bayne, for appellee:

When a right is given by statute, and a specific remedy provided, or a new power and also the means of executing it are therein granted, the power can be executed and the right vindicated in no other way than that prescribed by the Act.

Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 399; Dudley v. Mayhew, 8 N. Y. 9.

Bermudes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment sustaining a plea to the jurisdiction of a state court, relegating the plaintiff to that of a federal court. The action arises under the Act of Congress known as the "Interstate Commerce Act," and is for the recovery of damages for averred unlawful discriminations by defendant, injurious to plaintiff, for the transportation of coal from another State, for several years. Vide 24 Stat. at L. p. 882, § 9. The section relied on is to the effect "that any person or persons, claiming to be damaged by any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this Act, may either make complaint to the commission as herein-after provided for, or may bring suit, in his or their own behalf, for the recovery of damages for which such common carrier may be liable under the provisions of this Act, in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt." After referring to the ruling of the United States Supreme Court in the Case of Clafin, 98 U. S. 186, 187, 23 L. ed. 838, which is in point on the question, the district judge has well said: "The general rule is that, where a particular remedy is provided by law, such remedy must be sought, to the exclusion of all others, in the cases contemplated by the Statute; . . . otherwise a person claiming injury, under the Act of Congress, instead of being compelled to elect which one of the two methods of procedure provided by the Act he will adopt, would be afforded a third alternative, not contemplated or provided for by the said Act; and this in violation of its express terms, whereby he is limited to a choice between two remedies." The authority referred to contains the following language: "A legal or equitable right acquired under state laws may be prosecuted in the state courts, and also, if the parties reside in different States, in the federal courts. So rights, whether legal or equitable, acquired under the laws of the United States, may be prosecuted in the United States courts, or in the state courts competent to decide rights of the like character and class, subject to this qualification, that, where a right arises under a law of the United States, Congress may, if it see fit, give to the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is sometimes exclusive by express enactment, and sometimes by implication. If an Act of Congress gives a penalty to a party aggrieved, without specifying a remedy for its enforcement, there is no reason why it should not be enforced, if not provided otherwise, by some Act of Congress, by a proper action in a state court." In the instant case the right asserted by the plaintiff is claimed under an Act of Congress which specifies the remedy for its enforcement. This circumstance suffices to evidence that Congress saw fit to give the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction. The motive which induced such legislation may have been, and no doubt is, to create one entire and complete system, and provide for the necessary uniform machinery to make it effective on an important and vital subject of national interest. See further Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 399; Dudley v. Mayhew, 8 N. Y. 9; The Moses Taylor, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 429, 18 L. ed. 401; Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 384, 4 L. ed. 104; Ex parte McNeal, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 236, 20 L. ed. 624.

The authorities referred to by the appellant do not sustain his position.

the means of its exercise is provided, the power can be exercised and the right indicated only in the manner prescribed. Janney v. Buell, 55 Ala. 408; Phillips v. Ash, 63 Ala. 414; Chandler v. Hanna, 78 Ala. 300; Hollister v. Hollister Bank, 2 Keyes, 245.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

M. ROSSON, Appt.,

v.

John R. CARROL.

(....Tenn....)

1. The time for notice of dishonor of a note is the same whether it was indorsed before or after maturity.
2. A notary's testimony that he has an "impression" that he sent a notice of protest to a certain person by mail is insufficient proof of that fact where his certificate states merely that he handed the notices to an express agent from whom the notes had been received.
3. One who sends paper for collection, whether he indorses it or not, is entitled to notice of dishonor and to one day thereafter to notify prior indorsers.
4. Testimony that a notice of dishonor was given by a witness a "day or two after he received notice, and that it was on the 16th or 17th of April immediately after" he received notice, is insufficient to show that it was given in due time.
5. Demand of payment of a note indorsed when overdue, which is ineffectual because not followed by protest or notice, prevents any effectual demand and protest on a subsequent date.
6. Acknowledgment of liability by an indorser will not prevent his discharge for lack of notice of dishonor, unless distinctly made with full knowledge of his discharge.

7. Proof of statements by an indorser to third persons, merely showing that he thought himself still liable on a note from which he had been discharged by failure to give him notice of dishonor, does not establish an admission of liability.

(April 14, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Gibson County held at Trenton in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of an indorser of a promissory note, payment of which had been refused by the maker. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Neil & Deason and T. L. Mosely, for appellant:

While demand and notice are necessary in order to hold an indorser upon over-due paper, yet the demand need only be made, and the notice need only be given, in a reasonable time.

Defendant's conduct and dealing about the note furnish plenary proof that he had been duly served with notice.

NOTE.—Commercial paper; presentation, demand and notice essential.

The fact that the shop of the maker of a note is closed, and the holder is told that he has absconded, does not excuse presentation, demand and notice. Glaser v. Rounds, 16 R. L. 235, 6 New Eng. Rep. 500, citing Tebbetts v. Dowd, 23 Wend. 379; Thornton v. Wynn, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 183, 6 L. ed. 595; Low v. Howard, 11 Cush. 268; Edwards v. Tandy, 38 N. H. 840.

The insolvency of the maker does not dispense with presentment to him. Bassenhorst v. Wilby, 11 West. Rep. 370, 45 Ohio St. 333. See note to Turner v. Iron Chief Min. Co. (Wis.) 5 L. R. A. 533.

Payment must be demanded from the maker of a note, and notice of nonpayment forwarded to the indorser within due time, in order to render him liable. Magruder v. Union Bank of Georgetown, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 87, 7 L. ed. 612; Cox v. New York Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 712, 25 L. ed. 741.

If a demand of payment is made by the holder within banking hours, and payment is refused or neglected to be made, the holder is entitled to maintain his action for such dishonor. *Bank of United States v. The term "holder," within the meaning of the rule as to demand and protest and giving notices, includes the bank at which the note was payable and the notary who holds it as agent for those purposes. Bowling v. Harrison, 47 U. S. 6 How. 243, 13 L. ed. 425.

A delay of more than ten months in making a demand of payment and giving notice of protest, after the indorsement of a promissory note payable on demand, is unreasonable. Turner v. Iron Chief Min. Co. 5 L. R. A. 533, and note, 74 Wis. 355.

Where the holder does not know the place of residence or of business of the maker, a demand of the maker is excused if he has the note when due ready to be presented at the place where it is dated. Davis v. Eppler, 38 Kan. 623, citing Orcutt v. Hough, 54 N. H. 472; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 640.

Place of presentment, demand and notice.

Making and dating a note at a particular place does not supersede the necessity for presentment and demand at the residence or place of business of the maker. Oxnard v. Varnum, 3 Cent. Messrs. Cooper & Harwood, for appellee:

When demand is made and payment refused of a note indorsed after due to bind the indorser notice must be given to him immediately—that is, with the same promptness that is required in giving notice in cases where notes are indorsed before due. After demand made the same diligence is required in giving notice in the one case as in the other.

When a note is payable on demand, and demand is made and payment refused, notice must be given to the indorser immediately, as in ordinary cases of demand made on day of maturity.

Where the parties reside in the same city or town, the notice should be given at the dwelling-house or place of business; either mode is sufficient. Williams v. Bank of United States, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 93, 7 L. ed. 390, cited in Dickens v. Beal, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 561, 9 L. ed. 541; Wiseman v. Chiappella, 64 U. S. 23 How. 377, 16 L. ed. 499; Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 26 U. Where the indorser lives in the same town as the holder, notice must be given personally, either verbally or in writing, or a written notice be left at his dwelling-house or place of business, unless he has agreed to receive it elsewhere, or, by custom of the bank at which it was payable, notice might be left at the postoffice. Bowling v. Harrison, 47 U. S. 6 How. 248, 12 L. ed. 423.

Notice should be sent to the place where the party to be notified will be most likely to receive it. Bank of America v. Shaw, 2 New Eng. Rep. 572, 142 Mass. 290, citing Biles v. Nichols, 12 Allen, 443.

Notice to a partnership should be made at its place of business. Bank v. America v. Shaw, supra.

When a partnership is indorser of a note, proof of notice of its dishonor is sufficient, when left either at the place of business of such firm with someone in charge, or at the domicile or residence of one of the partners. Fourth Nat. Bank v. Althelmer, 8 West. Rep. 563, 91 Mo. 120; Story, Prom. Notes, § 812.

Notice of indorser of nonpayment.

An indorser, to be held on a dishonored note, must have legal notice of nonpayment, if his address is ascertainable by exercise of reasonable diligence. Hart v. McLeellan, 6 New Eng. Rep. 133, 30 Me. 96.

Where an indorser of a promissory note assigns all his property for the benefit of his creditors before maturity, notice of the demand of payment and nonpayment at maturity should be given to him; notice to the assignee is not sufficient. Johnson and Owen, JJ., dissent. House v. Vinton County Nat. Bank, 1 West. Rep. 155, 43 Ohio St. 346.

The indorser of a promissory note for the accommodation of the maker is entitled to strict notice. French v. The Bank of Columbia, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 141, 2 L. ed. 576, cited in Dickens v. Beal, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 577, 9 L. ed. 540.

A notary or any other agent of the holder may give the notice. Harris v. Robinson, 45 U. S. 4 How. 336, 11 L. ed. 1000, cited in Lambert v. Ghieselin, 50 U. S. 9 How. 558, 13 L. ed. 257.

Holding a note after dishonor, without notice to the indorser within a reasonable time, discharges him. Robertson v. Vogle, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 232, 1 L. ed. 123; Steinmetz v. Currey, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 264, 1 L. ed. 116; Bank of North America v. Vardon, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 73, 1 L. ed. 297; Warder v. Carson, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 233, 1 L. ed. 361; Ball v. Dennison, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 163, 1 L. ed. 733.

Form of notice.

No particular form of words in the notice of protest of a note is required. If it contain a true description of the note and states that it has been presented at maturity and dishonored, and that the holder looks to the indorser for payment, this is sufficient. Glicksman v. Barley (Wis.), Nov. 25, 1890, citing Aiken v. Marine Bank, 16 Wis. 679.

If it conveys to the party a sufficient knowledge of the particular note dishonored, it is sufficient. Mills v. Bank of United States, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat.

The notice must be given to the party sought to be charged.

Cooke v. Bank of Tennessee, 6 Humph. 52.

Knowledge of nonpayment does not take the place of notice. The indorser is entitled to have notice regularly given him, so he will know whether the holder intends to look to him for payment.

1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, p. 629; Cooke v. Bank of Tennessee, supra; Lane v. Bank of West Tennessee, 9 Helsk. 485; Alton v. Robinson, 2 Humph. 844.

Proof that the notice was mailed must be clear and distinct.

Weakly v. Bell, 9 Watts, 273, 36 Am. Dec. 119, 120.

When an indorser receives notice of non-payment he is allowed just the same time in which to give notice to a prior indorser that the holder had to give him notice.

McNeil v. Wyatt, 3 Humph. 126; Story, Prom. Notes, § 831.

He must be careful not to let a day intervene before he gives such notice, for if he does it will be fatal to his right of action against such prior indorser.

Story, Prom. Notes, § 832.

As complainant had not in fact indorsed the note, and it had not been indorsed by anyone in blank, he was not entitled to the rights and privileges of an indorser.

Butler v. Duval, 4 Yerg. 268; Byles, Bills, 7th ed. p. 296; and note c.

If the maker of a note is insolvent when the note is transferred, and this is known to the indorser, still the holder must make demand and give notice to bind the indorser.

431, 6 L. ed. 512, cited in Musson v. Lake, 45 U. S. 4 How. 281, 11 L. ed. 975; Dennistoun v. Stewart, 58 U. S. 17 How. 608, 15 L. ed. 229; Browning v. Andrews, 8 McLean, 578; Bank of Alexander v. Swana, 24 U. S. 9 Pet. 33, 9 L. ed. 40.

A notice of protest of negotiable paper designating dates by the figures "3-15-1884" and "2-11-'84" is sufficient. Brown v. Jones, 125 Ind. 375, citing Henry v. Indiana State Bank, 3 Ind. 216; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 845; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1224.

A letter to the indorser stating a demand and dishonor of the note need not inform him he is looked to for payment. Bank of United States v. Carneal, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 543, 7 L. ed. 512, cited in Chiopees Bank v. Philadelphia Seventh Nat. Bank, 75 U. S. 3 Wall. 649, 19 L. ed. 425.

A mistake as to the date of the note will not vitiate a notice of dishonor. Mills v. Bank of United States, supra.

Notice of dishonor must be made in reasonable time.

An indorser's liability upon a negotiable note depends upon notice of dishonor within a reasonable time. Bank of North America v. Pettit, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 127, 1 L. ed. 770; Bank of North America v. Wycoff, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 151, 1 L. ed. 778; Lenox v. Prout, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 520, 4 L. ed. 449, cited in Mitchell v. Degrand, 1 Mason, 180.

What is a reasonable time for notice to the indorser of nonpayment of a note is, in Pennsylvania, a question for the jury. Bank of North America v. McKnight, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 153, 1 L. ed. 330; Robertson v. Vogle, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 223, 1 L. ed. 123; Ball v. Dennison, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 163, 1 L. ed. 783.

Where an overdue note is transferred by indorsement, the indorser is still liable if it is presented to the maker within a reasonable time, and notice 12 L. R. A.

Alton v. Robinson, supra, citing Chitty, Bills, 529; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, p. 446, and notes; 8 Kent, Com. *110, 111, and authorities cited; Nash v. Harrington, 2 Alk. 9, 16 Am. Dec. 672; Byles, Bills, 7th ed. p. 808, and note c; Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1831, 1832.

When a party is once discharged from the payment of a note, as indorser, for want of notice, etc., a subsequent promise to pay it will not bind him unless he knew, when he made the promise, that, as a matter of law, he was discharged from its payment. A full knowledge of his discharge, as a matter of law as well as fact, is indispensable to the binding effect of such subsequent promise, and this must be shown by complainant.

Spurlock v. Union Bank, 4 Humph. 336; Golladay v. Union Bank, 2 Head, 64; Addison, Cont. 998; 8 Kent, Com. 113; Fitzgerald v. Gardner, Mass. April Term, 1889, at Jackson, Tenn.

The burden is on complainant to show notice was given in due time, by mail or otherwise, to bind the indorser. His proof must not be general and leave the matter in doubt, but explicit and clear that notice was given in due time.

Byles, Bills, 7th Sharswood's ed. p. 289; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1051-1053.

Caldwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in the chancery court by an indorsee against the indorser of an overdue promissory note. His bill being dismissed by the chancellor, complainant appealed. The substance of the pleadings is well stated in the given in case of non-payment. Bassenhorst v. Wilby, 11 West. Rep. 270, 45 Ohio St. 332.

Diligence required; a question of law.

Due diligence having once been exercised, the liability of the indorser is fixed, and subsequent information imposes no new duty on the holder. Lambert v. Ghieslin, 50 U. S. 9 How. 533, 13 L. ed. 254, cited in Hudgins v. Kemp, 50 U. S. 15 How. 519, 13 L. ed. 510.

The law does not require of the holder the highest and strictest degree of diligence, but only such reasonable diligence as will ordinarily bring home notice to the party. Bank of United States v. Hatch, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 250, 8 L. ed. 337.

Such diligence is not shown where the holder of a note, after its protest, mailed notice to an incorrect address, which was given to him by a clerk at the office of him from whom he received the note. Hart v. McLellan, 6 New Eng. Rep. 138, 80 Me. 9; Utica Bank v. De Mott, 13 Johns. 423.

Where the indorser had left town on a visit, notice left at a neighbor's, with a request to hand to the indorser when he should return is due diligence on the part of the holder. Williams v. Bank of United States, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 94, 7 L. ed. 360.

When notice of protest has not been actually received in due time by an indorser, the question is whether due diligence in giving notice has been shown; and this, when the facts are all found, is a question of law. Bank of America v. Shaw, 2 New Eng. Rep. 572, 142 Mass. 290. See Wheeler v. Field, 6 Met. 290.

If due diligence is used in sending the notice to the indorser, it is immaterial whether it is received or not. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 578, 7 L. ed. 269; Dickens v. Beal, 35 U. S. 10 assignment of errors and brief by complainant's counsel, as follows: "On the 29th day of October, 1887, the complainant, M. Rosson, filed his bill in the Chancery Court at Trenton against the defendant, John R. Carrol, in which bill he charged that on the 25th day of December, 1886, the Paragould Stave Manufacturing Co., of Paragould, Ark., executed to the firm of Ware, Bittick & Co. a promissory note for the sum of $2,087, with interest at 10 per cent per annum and payable one day after date. That said Ware, Bittick & Co., on the 1st day of April, 1887, indorsed and transferred said note to the complainant, and that he was the holder and owner of the same. That on the 12th day of April, 1887, the said note was duly presented for payment to the said Paragould Stave Manufacturing Company, by John M. Davis, a notary public, and payment refused, and due protest thereof made by said notary; and on the same day due notice was given to said Ware, Bittick & Co., and to all the parties. That the said Ware, Bittick & Co., at the time of said indorsement and said demand and notice and these transactions, was a partnership composed of G. T. Ware, Frank Bittick and John R. Carrol. That Bittick died insolvent in Arkansas, and the residence of Ware was unknown to complainant, and that he sued the defendant, John R. Carrol, alone. That said John R. Carrol had due notice of said protest, and of said demand and failure to pay, both as a member of the firm of Ware, Bittick & Co. and otherwise, and that he is bound upon said indorsement personally, and as a member of the firm of Ware, Bittick & Co.; and that he is bound in solido to the complainant. That said defendant, John R. Carrol, likewise received reasonable notice of said demand and failure to pay outside of and in addition to said protest and notice thereof by said notary. That the said note was overdue when indorsed to complainant; and the home of the Paragould Stave Manufacturing Co. was in the Town of Paragould, Ark., and complainant's home was in Obion County, Tennessee; and demand was made and notice given within a reasonable and lawful time. That said note was an Arkansas contract, and bears ten per cent by special stipulation upon its face, and that such was the lawful rate in Arkansas. That John R. Carrol was a citizen of Gibson County, Tenn." The prayer was for judgment, etc., in the usual form, and the oath to the answer was waived.

On the 24th of February, 1888, the defendant filed his answer. In this answer he admits that complainant is the holder and owner of the note described in the bill, and also admits the indorsement; and also admits that the home of the maker was in Paragould, Ark.; and also admits that the note bears 10 per cent, as charged, but insists that the maker was a corporation, and submits the question to the court whether the note would be usurious for that reason. He denies that on the 12th day of April, 1887, demand and notice and protest were made, as charged in the bill; denies that either he or Ware, Bittick & Co. received any notice; denies that due demand was made and notice given; denies that he received legal notice in any manner; denies that "demand

Whether or not due diligence is used in making inquiry for the residence or place of business of the maker or indorser of a note is, in most cases, a mixed question of law and fact. Ornard v. Varnum, 2 Cent. Rep. 53, 11 Pa. 193, citing Stuckert v. Anderson, 3 Whart. 116.

Where the parties do not reside in the same place, diligence consists in sending notice by the first mail of the day of protest, and this is all that is necessary, if the notice is properly directed. Dickens v. Beal, supra.

A married woman returning to her mother's residence after a temporary absence was properly regarded as a resident of that place for the purpose of a notice by mail of the dishonor of a note which she had indorsed. Wachusett Nat. Bank v. Fairbrother, 148 Mass. 181.

An abandoned residence may be considered as still subsisting, if no new residence has been established, and if the holder of the note does not know of the change. *Bliss v. #### Demand and notice, when not necessary.

A declaration that at the making of, and until the time for paying, a note, the maker had no effects of the indorser, and had not received any consideration from him for making or paying the note, but on the contrary made it for his accommodation, presents a legal excuse for failure to present the note for payment and give notice of dishonor. Blendermann v. Price (N. J.) 11 Cent. Rep. 349. See, as to the drawer of a bill of exchange, Bickerdike v. Bollman, 1 T. R. 406, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 4th Am. ed. 51; Rogers v. Stephens, 2 T. The indorser of a promissory note stands in the same position as the drawer of a bill of exchange for accommodation. Heylyn v. Adameson, 2 Burr. 609; Nicholson v. Gouthit, 2 H. Bl. 609; French v. Bank of Columbia, 8 U. S. 4 Cranch, 141, 2 L. ed. 578.

The guarantor of a promissory note whose name does not appear on the note is bound without notice, where the maker was insolvent at its maturity. Reynolds v. Douglass, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 497, 9 L. ed. 1171; Rhett v. Poe, 43 U. S. 2 How. 457, 11 L. ed. 338. See Ex parte Russell, 16 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 477.

When, by arrangement between the maker and the indorser, the latter has become primarily liable as when he is supplied by the maker with funds to pay it, no notice need be given. Ray v. Smith, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 411, 21 L. ed. 666.

It is for the jury to find whether he had become the principal debtor. Ibid.

Where the indorser has discharged the maker of a note by a release and settlement, he is not entitled to a notice of nonpayment. Burke v. McKay, 43 U. S. 2 How. 66, 11 L. ed. 181.

Where notes are deposited for collection, by way of collateral security for an existing debt, notice is not essential. Lawrence v. McCalmont, 43 U. S. 2 How. 426, 11 L. ed. 326.

In such case the holder is liable only in case of damage, loss or prejudice to the pledgor and then only to the extent of such damage. Kennedy v. Rosier, 71 Iowa, 671.

If it is known that an indorser has abandoned his residence, and if upon reasonable inquiry the place of his present residence cannot be ascertained, no notice at all need be given. Blakely v. Grant, 6 Mass. 386; Story, Prom. Notes, § 516; Walker v. Stetson, 14 Ohio St. 90; Blodgett v. Durgin, 32 Vt. 351; was made and notice given in a reasonable and lawful time," as charged; and avers "that the first that respondent ever heard of the fact that the maker thereof had failed to pay the said note was some months after it was indorsed to complainant," etc. He admits that the members of the firm of Ware, Bittick & Co. were correctly set forth in the bill, and states his own residence as at Kenton, Tenn. The answer also pleads as an offset a note of $50 which he held against the complainant, which he asks be set off against complainant's recovery, if complainant shall succeed in holding him, defendant, liable as indorser, etc. The note was payable to "Ware, Bittick & Co., or order," and when indorsed was three months and five days past due. The transfer was negotiated and made by the defendant, for his firm, in these words: "For value received, we transfer this note to M. Rosson, this 1st day of April, 1887. [Signed] Ware, Bittick & Co."

Before referring further to the facts of the case, the principal legal questions involved will be considered. What duties, with respect to demand and notice, does the indorsee of an overdue note owe to his indorser, or what legal steps must he take to convert the conditional liability of the indorser into an absolute obligation to pay the debt? The distinguishing feature of the liability of an indorser of any negotiable paper is that such liability is contingent upon due presentment for payment and notice of dishonor. Though a note transferred after maturity "comes disgraced to the indorsee" (as said by Lord Ellenborough in Tin- son v. Francis, 1 Campb. 19), and is, in his hands, subject to all equitable defenses attaching to it and existing between the maker and payee at maturity, it is nevertheless negotiable; and, in order that the indorser may be held liable, demand must be made of the maker and notice of non-payment given. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 886; Chitty, Bills, 159, 160; Byles, Bills, 163, 169; Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 674, 675; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 399, 407, 408; Story, Prom. Notes, § 178; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 996; Leavitt v. Putnam, 3 N. Y. 494; Berry v. Robinson, 9 Johns. 131; Kirkpatrick v. McCullough, 8 Humph. 171; Duffy v. O'Connor, 7 Baxt. 500; Pool v. Tolleson, 1 McCord, L. 199; Esfert v. Des Coudres, 1 Mill. Const. 69; Nash v. Harrington, 2 Aik. 9; McKinney v. Crawford, 8 Serg. & R. 353.

Yet the same strictness as to time of demand and notice is not in all particulars required with respect to such a note as must be observed in case of one indorsed before due. As between indorser and indorsee, a note transferred after maturity is deemed equivalent to a note payable on demand, and is subject to the same rule of diligence in the matter of presentment for payment and notice of dishonor. To bind the indorser in such a case it is incumbent on the indorsee to see that due demand is made in a reasonable time, and that notice is promptly given if payment be refused. Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 671, 673, 1046, 1096; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 611, 996; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 396, 397; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 381, 382, 519, 520; Byles, Bills, 7th ed. by Sharswood, 211, 212, and note, 169, 170; Colt v. Barnard,

Sufficiency of notice to indorser.

After demand of the maker of a note on the third day of grace, notice to the indorser on the same day is sufficient. Lindenberger v. Beall, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 104, 5 L. ed. 216; Bussard v. Levering, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 102, 5 L. ed. 215.

Notice actually delivered to a person of discretion at the place of residence or business of such party apparently acting for him is sufficient. Kellogg v. Pacific Box Factory, 57 Cal. 327; McFarland v. Pico, 6 Cal. 636; Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 406; Thompson v. Williams, 14 Cal. 160.

Notice of dishonor sent to former place of business of the indorsers,—an insolvent firm,—where it was received by the trustees for creditors, is sufficient. Casco Nat. Bank v. Shaw, 4 New Eng. Rep. 473, 79 Mo. 376, citing Bank of America v. Shaw, 142 Mass. 290, better reported in 2 New Eng. Rep. 572.

Notice to assignee of payee for the benefit of his creditors is sufficient. Callahan v. Bank of Kentucky, 32 Ky. 231; Chitty, Bills, 228; Byles, Bills, 216; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1002.

Where the assignee of an indorser continued the business at the same place, it may be inferred that assignee had authority from indorser to receive notices of protest sent there. Importers & T. Nat. Bank v. Shaw, 4 New Eng. Rep. 344, 144 Mass. 421.

The facts being undisputed, sufficiency of notice is a question of law. Lambert v. Ghieslin, 50 U. S. 9 How. 552, 13 L. ed. 254; Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 573, 7 L. ed. 296; Harris v. Robinson, 45 U. S. 4 How. 333, 11 L. ed. 1000.

But where the residence of the indorser was known, a notice given to his son, though at the place where notices for the indorser were usually left, was held not sufficient. Bank of United States 12 L. R. A.

v. Corcoran, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 121, 7 L. ed. 368, cited in Fowler v. Warfield, 4 Cranch, C. C. 71.

Notice to indorser of nonpayment, sent to the proper address when the note was issued, is sufficient, although he has changed his residence. Importers & T. Nat. Bank v. Shaw, supra; Bank of Utica v. Phillips, 3 Wend. 408; Saco Nat. Bank v. Sanborn, 63 Me. 340; Rowland v. Rowe, 48 Conn. 432; See Berridge v. Fitzgerald, L. R. 4 Q. B. 641.

It is not necessary to state in the notice who is the holder; it is sufficient that it states the fact of non-payment, and that the holder looks to the indorser for indemnity. Mills v. Bank of United States, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 431, 6 L. ed. 512, cited in Bank of United States v. Watterston, 4 Cranch, C. C. 445.

Nor need it contain a formal allegation that it was demanded at the place of payment. Mills v. Bank of United States, supra.

Notice of a note's dishonor is sufficient if addressed to the indorser and left in his office, in his absence, in a conspicuous place. Hobbs v. Straine, 149 Mass. 212, citing Importers & T. Nat. Bank v. Shaw, supra; Bank of America v. Shaw, 2 New Eng. Rep. 572, 142 Mass. 290.

A variance between the note and the notice to the indorser, if it does not mislead him, and if it conveys to him the real fact without any doubt, cannot be material. Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 33, 9 L. ed. 40.

Service of notice by mail.

The provision as to deposit of notice of non-payment, etc., of a note in the postoffice, is intended to cover and be applied to all kinds of places. Morse v. Chamberlain, 4 New Eng. Rep. 211, 144 Mass. 406; Stat. 1871, chap. 239; Pub. Stat. chap. 77, § 16.

A statute making deposit in the postoffice notice

18 Pick. 200; Jones v. Robinson, 11 Ark. 504; Gravel v. Struvel, 53 Iowa, 713; Union Bank v. Beall, 10 Humph. 386; Patterson v. Todd, 18 Pa. 426.

The point most contested in argument at the bar—one ably and learnedly debated on both sides—concerns the time in which notice of the dishonor of a note indorsed when overdue shall be given to the indorser. It is urged for complainant that the indorsee of such an instrument should have reasonable time in which to make demand, and like time in which to give notice. For defendant it is conceded that reasonable time is permitted for demand, but as to notice it is contended that it must be given with the same promptness as is required in case of indorsement before maturity. The authorities are somewhat in conflict, but we think the great weight of juridical opinion, as expressed in the text-books and in judicial decisions, is in favor of the rule we have just stated, and sustains the proposition that the same diligence must be used in giving notice of dishonor to the indorser of an overdue note as is required by the law-merchant in notifying one who indorses before maturity. In our opinion, the rule as to notice of non-payment to indorsers of time notes before due and of demand notes is and should be the same. We have seen no difference stated as to that matter in any authority, and do not perceive how a sound distinction could be taken, the reason for the notice being the same in each case. Then, if it be true, as announced by numerous authorities already cited, that indorsed demand notes and time notes indorsed after maturity are governed by the same rule in regard to notice of non-payment, it follows that one and the same rule of notice is to be applied to all the three classes of notes mentioned,—time notes indorsed before due, notes payable on demand, and time notes indorsed after maturity. Why should not this be so? It simplifies the law-merchant and facilitates transactions in commercial paper, in respect to which simplicity and uniformity in the rules of law are all-important and conducive to the prosperity and welfare of every community, especially of commercial people. Why should one who acquires an overdue note have or need more time to give notice of non-payment than the indorsee of a note acquired before maturity? He is justly allowed more indulgence in demanding payment of the maker, because the indorser knew at the time of the transfer that the maker was then in default; but when he has had all reasonable time for that purpose, the reason is not so satisfactory for extending the same indulgence with respect to notice. Certainly no more time for notification is needed by the one indorsee than by the other. We quote the language of some of the writers on this subject:

"If a negotiable note is indorsed after maturity it becomes in effect a demand note, and payment must be demanded within a reasonable time, and notice of dishonor at once given to the indorser." Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1098. "When a negotiable instrument is indorsed after maturity payment must be de-contemplates two modes of its delivery to him: at the postoffice where it is deposited, and by a letter carrier; and requires that it shall be sufficiently directed to his residence or place of business, for both modes. Morse v. Chamberlain, supra.

The notice of protest may be deposited in a street letter-box. Casco Nat. Bank v. Shaw, 4 New Eng. Rep. 673, 79 Me. 376.

It has been held that delivery to a letter carrier is sufficient. Pearce v. Langrit, 101 Pa. 507.

If parties live in different post towns, notice through the postoffice is sufficient. Bank of Columbia v. Lawrence, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 678, 7 L. ed. 209; Bussard v. Levering, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 102, 5 L. ed. 215, cited in Harris v. Robinson, 45 U. S. 4 How. 345, 11 L. ed. 1004.

When notice is sent by mail, it is sufficient to direct it to the town where the party resides, if it is a post town; if it is not, then to the postoffice or post town nearest to his residence, if it is known. Bank of United States v. Carneal, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 543, 7 L. ed. 513; Glicksman v. Earley (Wis.) Nov. 25, 1890.

Notice mailed to an indorser, at his place of business in another State where he kept a clerk or agent and had various men employed, is sufficient service by mail. Woolley v. Lyon, 5 West. Rep. 180, 117 Ill. 244.

A notice of dishonor of a negotiable promissory note sent by mail to the last known place of residence of the indorser, who receives the same, is sufficient. Cornett v. Hafler, 43 Kan. 60; 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1219.

Where the indorser receives his mail at the place where the note indorsed is payable, notice actually received by him through the mail is sufficient. Hendershot v. Nebraska Nat. Bank, 25 Neb. 127. See Phelps v. Stocking, 21 Neb. 443; Davis v. Eppler, 38 Kan. 629.

His receipt of the notice through the mail cures an omission to address the notice itself. Glicksman v. Earley, supra.

Evidence of the postmaster and his deputy, as to the course of mail and the usages of the office, is uniformly received in cases arising on the notice of dishonored bills. Dickens v. Beal, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 672, 9 L. ed. 536.

The fact that the letter containing the notice was taken from the mail-bag in violation of a postal regulation is immaterial. Stanley v. McElrath, 10 L. R. A. 545, 549, 36 Cal. 449.

Notice sent to parties residing in a different place, by the mail, the next day after the dishonor of the note, is in due time. Bank of Alexandria v. Swann, 34 U. S. 9 Pet. 38, 9 L. ed. 40; Lenox v. Roberts, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat. 373, 4 L. ed. 264.

If the party is in the habit of receiving his letters at a more distant postoffice, or through a more circuitous route, and the fact is known to the person sending notice, notice sent by the latter mode will be good. Bank of United States v. Carneal, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 543, 7 L. ed. 513.

Insufficient notice by mail.

Notice of protest mailed to a person who resided in the same town as the indorser, deposited by him the next day in the local postoffice, and delivered on the third day to the indorser, is insufficient to charge the indorser. Cassidy v. Kreamer (Pa.) 13 Cent. Rep. 286.

Where a note was payable at a certain bank notice directed to an indorser at the place where the bank is situated, but who lives eight and one half miles distant, and near another postoffice, at which he gets his mail, does not constitute a valid service. Citizens Nat. Bank v. Cade, 73 Mich. 449.

A memorandum on a note, that the "third indorser, J. P. H., lives at Vicksburg," is not sufficient to show an agreement on his part to receive notice through the Vicksburg postoffice. Bowling v. Harrison, 47 U. S. 6 How. 243, 12 L. ed. 423.

manded of the payor within a reasonable time, and notice, in the event of a refusal, given to the indorser, in order to charge him; it being regarded as equivalent to one payable on demand." Dan. Neg. Inst. § 611. It will be observed that the latter author does not in terms state when the notice shall be given, but he does say, in effect, that the same rule as to notice is applicable to a note indorsed after maturity as to one payable on demand. He makes substantially the same statement in section 996 of the same learned and valuable treatise; and at the same time mentions the fact that some of the cases have been less strict on the subject of notice, thereby departing from the principle by him deemed "clearly correct." Those cases are among the number relied on by complainant's counsel, and will be referred to again. Says Parsons: "We have already seen that in order to charge an indorser of a note payable on demand presentment must be made within a reasonable time. But if, after such presentment, the note is dishonored, there is no good reason why the same rules as to the time within which notice is to be forwarded to the indorser should not apply, as in the case of other notes and bills. We have also seen that a note or bill in which no time of payment is specified is to be considered as payable on demand. We should say in this case also that notice should be given within the same time as in the other cases. It has already been remarked that a note indorsed when overdue is by the best authorities considered equivalent to a note or bill on demand, though some cases hold that the same strict rules are not to be applied. It has been said that the holder has a reasonable time after presentment within which to notify the indorser, and that this reasonable time may be as long as two months, and an opinion has been expressed that no notice at all is necessary. To maintain these views would seem to be introducing unnecessary distinction, and in our opinion the notice should be transmitted as soon in the case of such notes and bills as of any others. If the analogy between notes and bills on demand and those indorsed when overdue, and notes and bills payable at sight, is to be carried out, the same notice of dishonor would certainly be requisite, for no distinction that we are aware of has ever been attempted to be drawn between the time necessary in forwarding notice to an indorser of a bill at sight and one in which there is a fixed time for payment." 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 519, 520. The two cases here disapproved by Parsons are the same referred to by Daniel (in § 996) as being contrary to the correct principle. "The authorities," says Wade, "are not in perfect accord as to the right of an indorser of negotiable paper which at the time of indorsement was past due, to notice. The doctrine is announced in Gray v. Bell, 2 Rich. L. 67, and Van Hoesen v. Van Alstyne, 8 Wend. 75, that indorsers of overdue paper are not entitled to notice of its dishonor beyond such as would arise from the bringing of a suit within a reasonable time, which might extend to several months. In the latter case three months was regarded as a reasonable time. But, notwithstanding the views expressed in these two cases, the current of authority seems to be decidedly against the exception therein contended for. Indorsers after maturity, as well as indorsers of paper due at sight or on demand, sustain the same relations to each other and to other parties, in regard to the matter of notice, as indorsers of time paper before maturity, with the single exception that they have a right to insist upon the exercise of diligence on the part of the holder in demanding payment. Such indorsement is regarded as equivalent to drawing a new bill, or making a new note, payable at sight or on demand." Wade, Notice, § 738. The two cases here declared to be decidedly against the current of authority are the same subjected to criticism by the two preceding authors. "In every case of the dishonor of a promissory note it is the duty of the holder to give due notice thereof to all the prior parties on the note who are liable to make payment to him, and to whom he means to look for payment. [And this is equally true if the note is payable on demand.]" Story, Prom. Notes, 6th ed. § 299. Though this distinguished author does not in this quotation specify notes indorsed before maturity or notes indorsed after maturity, nor define the time in which notice shall be given further than to say it shall be "due notice," it is obvious from the comprehensiveness of his language that he intended to embrace both in the same general rule. Having discussed the subject of the indorsement of time notes before and after maturity, and of sight and demand notes, in preceding chapters, it was sufficient, in laying down a rule deemed applicable to all alike, to say: "In every case of the dishonor of a promissory note it is the duty of the holder to give due notice," etc. It is elsewhere said: "When a note is indorsed after maturity it must be demanded of the maker within a reasonable time, and immediate notice given of non-payment." Byles, Bills, 7th ed. by Sharswood, 170, note.

In Cott v. Barnard, the suit was by indorsees against indorser of overdue note. Neither demand nor notice was proved. The head note of the case is as follows: "Indorser of a note overdue is not liable thereon unless demand is made upon maker within reasonable time, and immediate notice of non-payment given to such indorser; so, though the maker is insolvent and has absconded." Chief Justice Shaw, in the opinion says: "It is very clear that a promissory note is negotiable after it falls due, as well as before. . . . It is like drawing a bill at sight, on which a drawer or indorser cannot be holden without presentment and notice of non-payment. All the reasons which require a demand and notice, in any case, to charge the indorser, apply to this. There is the same reason for prompt notice, namely, that the indorser may take measures to secure payment if the note is dishonored on presentment. . . . As between maker and promisee, a note is payable on demand, at any time after it becomes due. When it is indorsed after due, it is in legal effect a note on demand; and it is to be understood by the parties as if written 'on demand.' In that case the law is well settled the demand must be made within reasonable time, and, if not paid, immediate notice of non-payment must be given to the indorser." 18 Pick. 260.

In Jones v. Robinson the indorsee of an overdue note sued the indorser. The testimony produced to show notice of non-payment was not admissible. The court said: "When a note has been indorsed after maturity, as in the case at bar, it is in legal effect, as between the indorser and indorsee, an inland bill of exchange, payable on demand; while between the indorsee and maker it remains a note, in effect payable on demand. Consequently, to charge the indorser, it must be presented within a reasonable time after the transfer, and, if payment be refused, immediate notice must be given to the indorser, all the incidents of an inland bill payable on demand having place as between these two parties as to due diligence and lawful excuse for want of it; and this, because the indorser's undertaking is predicated upon conditions, and unless these are performed they cannot be made absolute, so as to entitle the holder to an action against him. And in this respect there is no difference whether the paper be indorsed before its maturity or afterwards. Although there is a difference in another respect,—that is to say, when a note is indorsed before due that is payable at a day certain, it must be demanded on the day it becomes due, without regard to circumstances to fit the indorser; whereas that same note, if indorsed after maturity, need not of necessity be presented on any given day, it having become in legal effect a note payable on demand. But, whether the paper be indorsed before or after maturity, all the reasons which require demand and notice equally apply, and in each case there is the same necessity for prompt notice of non-payment, that the indorser may take measures to secure the payment if the note be dishonored on presentment." 11 Ark. 504.

In Patterson v. Todd the court said: "The questions for decision in this case have relation to the effect of indorsing a promissory note overdue. . . . Where a note is indorsed before it is due the holder must present it for payment at maturity, and, in case of default, must give immediate notice of the dishonor. But after the note becomes due it is payable whenever the holder chooses to demand it, and for this purpose an action at law is sufficient as between the holder and the maker. Like a contract for the payment of money when no time of payment is specified, it is legally payable presently. So that, when a note is indorsed, the indorser still stands in the condition of the drawer of an inland bill of exchange; and we refer to the note, as before, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount, and time and place of payment. The time of payment having passed, the note is, in law, payable on demand; and this shows that the indorsement is to be considered as if made upon a new note payable on demand, and the legal effect of it is precisely the same as if the indorser had drawn an inland bill of exchange upon the maker, payable at sight. It is the duty of the holder of such a bill to present it for payment within a reasonable time, and, if the bill be dishonored, to give immediate notice thereof to the drawer. In the case of an indorsement of a note overdue, the holder is, in like manner, bound to present it for payment within a reasonable time; and, in case of non-payment, to give immediate notice of the dishonor to the indorser; otherwise the latter is discharged from liability. This doctrine is fully sustained by the authorities." 18 Pa. 426.

In Graul v. Strutzel the court said: "It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff that as to the note, which was overdue when it was indorsed, no demand of payment and notice of non-payment to the indorser was necessary. But such is not the rule. A note indorsed after due must be presented to the makers for payment within a reasonable time; and notice of non-payment must be given to the indorser immediately, which means at furthest the next day after default, where the parties reside in the same town." 53 Iowa, 712.

In our own case of Union Bank v. Keell, the suit was against the indorser of an overdue bill of exchange. It was drawn on a citizen of Philadelphia, Pa., and indorsed by the Union Bank at Columbia, Tenn., to the plaintiff, who presumably resided at the latter place. The plaintiff caused the bill to be presented for payment twenty six days after indorsement, which being refused by the drawee, protest was made, and the indorser "duly notified thereof." In the opinion this court, speaking through Judge Green, said: "Two questions are made upon the record by the counsel for the plaintiff in error. (1) It is insisted that a bill of exchange, after due, is functus officio, and that, if indorsed, no action lies on the instrument against such indorser. We understand the settled doctrine to be otherwise. A bill may be transferred as well after as before it is due. The difference is that, if it is transferred after due, as there is no time fixed for payment, it is, in such case, payable on demand. The party who indorses a bill after it is due, and negotiates it, gives to it, as far as he is concerned, all the character and efficacy of a bill payable on demand. (2) It is insisted that his honor erred in telling the jury that, the bill being overdue when the plaintiff got it, it was necessary for him to show that he had presented it for payment in a reasonable time; and that what was reasonable time to make demand of payment was a question of fact, to be judged of by the jury, according to the circumstances of the case. We think this construction strictly correct." 10 Humph. 386. Nothing is said in respect to notice in this case, except that the indorser was "duly notified" of presentment and non-payment; but the bill in suit was declared to have "all the character and efficacy of a bill payable on demand." From this it follows that it was subject not only to the same rule as to demand, but also as to notice.

In Kirkpatrick v. McCullough, 8 Humph. 171, and Duffy v. O'Conner, 7 Bart. 500, no rule is laid down as to the time in which either demand or notice is required. The adjudication in each case is simply that the liability of an indorser of an overdue note is contingent upon demand and notice.

The principal question in the early case of Stothart v. Lewis, decided by this court in 1807, was upon the point of notice. The note in suit was indorsed after maturity. No notice of the maker's failure to pay was ever given the indorser except by commencement of suit against him. In that case the court said: "When a negotiable paper, under the Act of 1763 or 1786, is indorsed, it should be presented for:

payment within a reasonable time, and, if refused or neglected, the indorser ought to have notice immediately of such failure, and that the holder intends to look to the indorser.

Where a bill of exchange is indorsed after the time of payment it is usually taken on the credit of the indorser, but this does not seem to be the case with an indorsement of a promissory note. It is taken, whether before or after the note is due, with a view to the drawer in the first instance, and should in either case be presented for payment and notice given." 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 356. Taking the first and last sentences of this quotation together, it is seen that the court in effect places an indorser before maturity and one after maturity on the same footing with respect to notice, and says that in either case "the indorser ought to have notice immediately." Such is the clear meaning of the language used, and the doctrine so announced is in substance the same as that laid down in the later decisions and text-books from which we have made quotations on the same subject. The case of Stothart v. Parker, which was decided in the same month, and reported in the same book (Id. 260) and which is now relied on as announcing a contrary doctrine, and thereby sustaining the contention here made for complainant, will be noticed hereafter.

There are four adjudicated cases from other States in conflict with the proposition that the same diligence must be used in giving notice of the dishonor of a note indorsed when overdue as is required in case of one indorsed before maturity; three of them holding that more time is allowed in the former than in the latter case, and the other holding that commencement of suit is sufficient notice in the former case. These cases are: Van Hoesen v. Van Alstyne, 3 Wend. 75; Gray v. Bell, 2 Rich. L. 67, 44 Am. Dec. 277; Chadwick v. Jeffers, 1 Rich. L. 397, 44 Am. Dec. 260; Jordan v. Hurst, 12 Pa. 269. In the first of these the court said: "The note, having been transferred long after it was due, is to be considered as a note payable on demand; and the demand and notice must be made in a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time depends on the circumstances of the case. From the remark of the defendant below, that Cooley would get into business again, and pay, it is evident an immediate demand and notice was not contemplated. The demand was in fact made within a few weeks, and the notice given within two or three months. I am inclined to think this was sufficient, under the circumstances of the case, to charge the indorser." 3 Wend. 75. Though notice given within two or three months after demand is here held to be sufficient to bind the indorser, the holding is predicated upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, among which was the fact that he evidently did not contemplate immediate notice. This is one of the two cases referred to disparagingly by Daniel, Parsons and Wade. It is also "commented upon, and its correctness denied, by Church, Ch. J., in Lockwood v. Crawford, 18 Conn. 361," says a note to 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 519. The opinion is in accord with authorities heretofore considered in the announcement that "the note, having been transferred long after it was due, is to be considered as a note payable on demand." The head note in Gray v. Bell is as follows: "Demand and notice by the indorsee of a note past due are necessary to render the indorser liable as a new maker of the note. What is reasonable diligence in making demand of the drawee, and giving notice to the indorser of a note past due, is a question which should be left to the jury." The indorser of an overdue note is in this case held to be in the attitude of an additional maker, and not subject to the rules of an ordinary indorser. In the opinion the court said: "The paper being past due, and, in mercantile contemplation, dishonored, it was not subject to the same rules that would be applicable to a note indorsed before it was due. The invariable presumption of the law should be that where one indorses a note when past due he does so on the knowledge that payment has been demanded, and refused by the maker. The indorsee takes the note, under such circumstances, as much on the credit of the indorser as upon that of the maker. . . . The doctrine is this: That an indorser of a promissory note, whether to bearer or order after it is past due, is an additional maker, with a postponed liability, depending on the diligence of his indorsee, which must always be left as a question of fact to the jury." 3 Rich. L. 67, 44 Am. Dec. 277. This is the other case referred to with disapprobation by the three text-writers just mentioned. Parsons and Daniel speak of it as dispensing with notice altogether. In Chadwick v. Jeffers, the head note states the points decided. It is this: "Rules of diligence in demanding payment of negotiable instruments indorsed before due do not apply to those indorsed after due. These rules are designed for the security of parties secondarily liable, and when demand or notice is not necessary for their protection it is dispensed with. Commencing suit and notice thereof to indorser is sufficient notice and demand when the note was overdue when transferred, and the suit was begun in a reasonable time, and at the request of the indorser." 1 Rich. L. 397, 44 Am. Dec. 260. The last two cases were decided by the Supreme Court of South Carolina in 1845. Though not expressly they seem impliedly to modify the cases of Esfert v. Des Coudres, 1 Mill, Const. 69, and Poole v. Tolleson, 1 McCord, L. 199, decided by the same court in 1817 and 1821, respectively. Especially is this so of Poole v. Tolleson, in which the majority of the court said immediate notice was required as much in case of the indorsement of an overdue note as in that of any other, and the minority expressed the opinion that notice at any time before action brought was sufficient. The point decided in Jordan v. Hurst is well stated in the syllabus as follows: "An indorser of an overdue note is not discharged by want of notice for three months of the subsequent demand and refusal, there being no evidence that he was injured by such want of notice." 12 Pa. 269. This case is much criticised, and virtually overruled, by the same court in Patterson v. Todd, 18 Pa. 426, to which we have already referred, and from which we have made free quotation. So, the only one of the four adverse cases that has escaped unfavorable criticism is Chadwick v. Jeffers: and it may have met the same fate and the fact be unknown to us. Certainly it cannot stand against so nearly all the other authorities.

Stothart v. Parker, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 260, decided by this court in 1807, is also relied on by complainant's counsel to sustain their contention with respect to the matter of notice. The report of the case is very brief. The plaintiffs, who were the indorsees of an overdue note, made demand of payment without effect, but failed to give notice of non-payment to the indorser. The court said: "In relation to promissory notes, there is the same necessity for demand of the drawer and notice of non-payment if assigned after being due as before. The general rule is that there should be this notice within a reasonable time." 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 262. It is the "general rule" with which we are now dealing, and by that rule, it is said, in the last case, "a reasonable time" is allowed in which to give notice. It will be observed, however, that no difference is made between the rule where the note is indorsed before due and where it is indorsed after due. The reasonable time meant by the court is alike applicable to both. Many of the older authorities state without reference to the time of indorsement, whether before or after maturity, that notice of dishonor must be given "within a reasonable time," and that what constitutes such reasonable time is a question of fact for the jury in each case. But the courts have now fixed this period so definitely that it has become a question of law by the weight of authority, and cannot so appropriately be now spoken of as merely reasonable time. Byles, Bills, 285, 286, and notes; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 506, 507, 510, 511; Story Prom. Notes, § 819; Chitty, Bills, 11th ed. 323; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 337; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1251 et seq. The modern authorities do not mean, of course, that the time allowed shall be so short as to be unreasonable, but simply that the period is now so well fixed as a matter of law that it can be better defined otherwise than by using the rather indefinite phrase of some of the cases. Whatever terms may be used, they generally mean the same thing, in legal contemplation, or nearly so, and refer to indorsements before and after maturity without distinction as to the time of notice. "Notice of dishonor," says Randolph, in his very learned work, "must be sent in all cases within a reasonable time. The indefiniteness of this phrase has, however, been closely restricted and defined by modern decisions. In sending notice of dishonor every party through whom it is transmitted is bound to use reasonable diligence in forwarding it. And the rule requiring notice of dishonor to be sent in a reasonable time applies to notice given to an indorser after maturity; no greater diligence being required in his case than in that of an ordinary indorser or drawer." Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1251. The language employed by the court in Stothart v. Parker, supra, does not authorize the distinction counsel would make, or justify the contention that more time for giving notice is allowable where the indorsement was made after the maturity of the note than where it was made before maturity. Then the irresistible conclusion from the authorities is that the rule with respect to the time within which notice of non payment must be given to the indorser is the same whether the indorsement be made before or after the maturity of the note.

The next inquiry is as to the time within which the notice must be sent—how soon after dishonor. The authorities seem to be agreed that it must be sent on the next regular business day; but, in case the parties reside in different places, and the notice is to be transmitted by mail, there seems to be some conflict as to whether it must be sent at all hazards by the mail of that day, depart when it may, or whether, if the departure be at an unreasonable hour, it will be sufficient to send it by the first mail of the second day; and again, whether if there be two mails on the first day after dishonor, it will answer to send the notice by the latter. Byles says: "If the post does not go out on the next day, notice need not be posted till the day after, or till the next post day." Byles, Bills, 286. Chitty says: "And if there be no post on the next day, or if the post go at an unreasonable hour in the morning, then he must send notice by the very next post. But he is not bound, on account of there being no post on the day after he receives notice, to forward it on the very day he receives it." Chitty, Bills, 11th ed. 326. Kent expresses the opinion that it is sufficient if the notice be mailed at any time on the day after dishonor (3 Kent, Com. 106, note); and Story says this is now the established doctrine (Story, Prom. Notes, 411); but Parsons thinks it too liberal to the indorsee, as almost necessarily giving him more than one whole day (1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 508); and with him Daniel seems to agree. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1040. A later author says: "The rule requiring notice to be given in a reasonable time has been narrowed down so as to require notice to be given at latest on the next day after the maturity of the paper." Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1259. Again: "But the better rule is now generally recognized that notice must be mailed in time to go by the mail of the next day, if there is any; and that any mail of that day is sufficient." Id. § 1266. Daniel states a rule, which he says is sanctioned by numerous and eminent authorities, and may be safely followed in all cases thus: "In other words, the notice must be sent by the first mail which leaves after the day of dishonor is passed, and does not close before early and convenient business hours of the day succeeding the day of dishonor; the design of the law being to afford the holder an opportunity to mail the notice on the day succeeding that of dishonor." Dan. Neg. Inst. 8d. ed. § 1089. By another learned jurist the rule is stated as follows: "The older authorities state that the notice must be given a reasonable time after the dishonor. But the present rule of the law-merchant is that the holder has until the expiration of the next day after dishonor in which to give notice, subject to certain modifications, necessary in the cases where the notices have to be sent away from the place of protest. When the party entitled to notice resides in the place of protest, the notice may be sent to him at his residence at any time during the day following the dishonor of the paper before the hours of rest. But if he is to leave the notice at the party's place of business it must be left during business hours. When the notice is to be sent to one resident elsewhere, the holder has until the last mail of the day after dishonor is made up, provided the mail on that day does not leave at an unreasonable hour. If it leaves at an unreasonable hour, the holder has until the next mail to send out his notices." Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 837. The rule deduced by Parsons from what he calls "the most recent authorities" and that which he approves, is "that the holder is bound to forward the notice as early as by a mail of the day after dishonor which does not start at an unreasonably early hour; and if there is no mail which leaves on that day after a reasonably early hour, the notice is to be forwarded by the next mail which starts thereafter." 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, 511.

On the next day after the indorsement complainant placed the note in charge of the Southern Express Company at Union City for collection from the maker at Paragould, with special instruction to "protest if not paid." This instruction was written on the shipping envelope of the company in which the note was sent to Paragould and returned. On this envelope, when returned, after the printed words, "When presented," and in the space allowed for answer, were written the following figures: " $\frac{3}{4}$  —  $\frac{1}{4}$ ," indicating clearly that the note had been twice presented for payment,—once on the 4th, and again on the 12th of April. The president of the Paragould Stave Manufacturing Company, which was the maker of the note, testifies that the agent of the express company twice demanded payment of him, but when this was he does not state. The fair inference is that the figures indorsed on the envelope indicate the dates at which such demands were made. On the 12th of April John M. Davis, as notary public, wrote on the note, "Protested for non-payment," and made full and formal certificate of protest, reciting, among other things, presentment of the note by himself to the maker for payment, and the refusal to pay. In addition to the production of this certificate, complainant read as evidence on the trial the deposition of the notary, in which he deposed positively that he made the demands as in the certificate recited. This is plenary proof of the formal presentment and protest of the note by the notary, though the president, of whom the demand is said to have been made, does not recollect that anyone except the agent of the express company ever presented the note to him for payment. The certificate alone would have been sufficient to establish the facts therein stated in the absence of contrary proof, being prima facie evidence of the facts, which the notary, in virtue of his office, was authorized to certify. Golladay v. Union Bank, 2 Head, 58; Sulzbacher v. Charleston Bank, 86 Tenn. 201; Code, §§ 1800, 1801; Randolph, Commercial Paper, §§ 1810, 1812; Gardner v. Tennessee Bank, 1 Swan, 419; Caruthers v. Harbert, 5 Coldw. 862; Colms v. Tennessee Bank, 4 Baxt. 429; Spence v. Crockett, 5 Baxt. 576. The notary's certificate also recites that he had on the same day "given due notice to the parties concerned, in writing, . . . in the manner following: To Paragould Stave Manuf. Co., Ware, Bittick & Co., M. Rosson, by handing to agent of Southern Express Co." Though the recital is that he gave notice to Ware, Bittick & Co., as a firm only, and that he did that "by handing" it to the express agent, the notary states in his deposition that he thinks he sent notice to the defendant individually, at Kenton, Tenn. Since much stress is laid on his evidence, the statements of the notary on this point will be noticed more at length. His answer to the general question whether he gave notice of non-payment and protest, when and to whom is: "I did. On the 12th day of April, 1887, I sent notices to Paragould Stave Manuf. Co., Ware, Bittick & Co. and M. Rosson;" failing to mention the name of defendant, or to say that he sent him notice. When asked pointedly if he sent notice to the defendant, J. R. Carrol, at Kenton, Tenn., he replied: "Think I did, but cannot say positively." Being further interrogated by complainant's counsel, he said: "My best recollection is that I asked Mr. John Rosson Mr. John R. Carrol's address, for the purpose of giving him notice of protest of note, and suppose he had notice." The next question and answer is as follows: "How did you give him notice? Through the U. S. mail? Answer. Don't remember; suppose in same manner, of course, as the others." On cross-examination this witness said this was the first note he ever protested; that he could not say "positively" how many notices he handed the express company, and did not remember to what point the notice to Ware, Bittick & Co. was addressed. John Rosson corroborates the notary to the extent of saying that the latter asked him for the address of defendant, and that the desired information was given.

Notice was sent by mail to the complainant on the 12th day of April. This is demonstrated by the post-mark on the envelope containing the notice. But whether mailed by the notary, or by the express agent after receiving it from the notary, does not appear. The supposition that it was done by the agent would be consistent with the certificate of protest. However, if assumed to have been done by the notary himself, that would be only a circumstance indicating at most that he made duplicate notices for each party to be notified, handing one sent to the express agent, and mailing the other himself. It would not establish the insistence that notice was in fact mailed to the defendant, either in his own name or in that of the indorsing firm of which he was a member. If the express agent mailed one of the notices handed to him by the notary to complainant, it would be reasonable to suppose that he mailed the others likewise to the parties for whom intended. But this would be one supposition based on another, which, of course, cannot be a substitute for proof of the fact. What the express agent did with any of the notices stated in the certificate of protest to have been placed in his hands is not disclosed in the record. His testimony was not taken. The defendant denies that he received any notice for himself or his firm. The evidence alluded to, which is substantially all that is to be found in the record on the subject of notice by mail, is not sufficient to show that any notice of dishonor was ever mailed to the defendant in his individual name or for Ware, Bittick & Co., either by the notary or any other person. At best it but discloses an impression on the mind of the notary that he mailed notice to defendant, and raises a mere inference that the express agent likewise gave him notice by the same method. Impressions and inferences are not enough. To meet the requirement of the law evidence of an affirmative and positive character must be produced. Whitaker v. Morrison, 1 Fla. 25; Byles, Bills, 289; Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1312. A notary's belief, based on entry in his notarial book and his habit "is good evidence," though he have no independent recollection of the transaction. Tennessee Bank v. Cowan, 7 Humph. 70. So entries on such book, opposite the protest, reciting, "Indorser duly notified in writing," and "Indorser duly notified verbally," have been held sufficient proof of notice, when coupled with proof of notary's habit of business. Bell v. Perkins, Peck (Tenn.) 262; McNeill v. Elam, Id. 268. It has also been decided by this court that the notary's certificate, reciting that he gave notice, in connection with his statement as a witness that he was "satisfied in his own mind that he had given the notice as stated in his certificate on the protest," is sufficient proof of the fact, though he at the time of the trial had no recollection of having given the notice. Worley v. Waldran, 3 Sneed, 549. But those cases are not in point here, for in this case there is no confirmatory entry on the notarial book, no recital in certificate of protest that the notary gave defendant notice, and no proof that to have done so would be in accord with his business habits. On the contrary, he shows that he made no entry; that he had no business habit at that time, it being his first official act, and the certificate of protest produced is in direct conflict with his impression, for it recites that he gave notice to the parties concerned "by handing" same to agent of the express company.

But complainant's case is not rested alone on the assumption that notice was duly sent to defendant from Paragould,—the place of demand and protest. On the contrary, he claims that he was himself entitled to the rights of an indorser with respect to notice, having placed the note in the hands of the express company for collection, though without indorsement; and that, in exercise of a legal right, he gave the defendant in person proper notice in due time after receiving his own notice, whereby defendant's liability became fixed, the same as if notice had been sent him direct from the home of the maker and place of demand. It is a well-established rule of law that where there are two or more indorsements of negotiable paper the holder may give notice of dishonor to all the indorsers, and also that each successive indorser, reckoned inversely, likewise has the right to notify his immediate indorser and those before him; and that to do this he is entitled to the same time after the receipt of his own notice as was allowed the holder originally. Furthermore, that one who holds a note as collecting agent is allowed the same time for receiving and transmitting notice as a beneficial holder; and his principal is entitled to notice as an indorser. Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1261, 1262; Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 992, 998, 965, 995a, 1044; Story, Prom. Notes, § 826; Byles, Bills, 292, notes; Butler 12 L. R. A.

v. Duval, 4 Yerg. 265; McNeill v. Wyatt, 3 Humph. 126; Hill v. Planters Bank, Id. 670; Simpson v. Turney, 5 Humph. 419.

In our own cases, supra, and in several other cases cited by the text-writers for the proposition that the principal is entitled to notice as an indorser and to time after its reception to notify those antecedent to him on the paper, the beneficial owners had nominally indorsed the paper to the collecting agent; but we do not understand that the rule depends on the indorsement as a prerequisite. Certainly there is the same reason for the rule in each case. The agent has no beneficial interest in the paper in either instance. His relation and his duty to his principal is the same whether he receives the paper by nominal indorsement or by delivery merely. His obligation is to his principal only, and that obligation, as a matter of law, does not in any case require him to give notice to anyone except his principal, though it may be otherwise by special contract. United States Bank v. Goddard, 5 Mason, 366, 3 Myers, Fed. Dec. §§ 1016, 1017. In New York it was decided that an attorney, to whom a note was sent for collection without indorsement, was entitled to one day in which to notify his client of the dishonor, and that the client was allowed still another day to send notice to his indorser. Farmers Bank of Bridgeport v. Vail, 21 N. Y. 485. "And it has been held," says Randolph, "that where the holder employs an attorney to ascertain the residence of an indorser, the attorney, after learning the fact, may take a day to inform his principal of it, and, after receiving such information, he may have until the next day to give notice." Randolph, Com. Paper, concluding sentence of section 1262, citing Firth v. Thrush, 8 Barn. & C. 887. Under the head of "Banks and other Agents for Collection," Daniel cites the same case for the same proposition, and concludes the section by giving the reason for the general rule as follows: "The factor or other agent or attorney may not know which of the prior parties his principal may desire to hold bound to him, or he may not know where notice would find them, as he has no interest in the bill or note, or privity with the parties; and the rule placing such agents on the footing of a distinct holder is essential to the convenient collection and management of negotiable paper." Dan. Neg. Inst. § 992. Another distinguished writer bases the rule on the same reasoning (Story, Prom. Notes, § 826), which, as we have already said, applies with the same force and propriety to a note or bill passed to the agent by delivery merely as to one indorsed to him for collection. So, on the authorities cited, and on the reason of the rule, we are of the opinion that the question of indorsement or no indorsement to the collecting agent is entirely immaterial in the decision of this case; and therefore complainant, though he placed the note in the hands of the express company by delivery merely, and without indorsement, was nevertheless entitled to one day after receiving information of its dishonor in which to give the defendant notice thereof, provided complainant's agent exercised due diligence in making demand, and informing him of non-payment. If there was any negligence in those matters on the part of the agent, that negligence is to be imputed to the principal, as in every other case, and, if sufficient in degree, will defeat the action.

We are aware of the statement in at least one case that the owner of a paper placed in the hands of a collecting agent by mere delivery should not be allowed any of the advantages of an indorser, because he has none of an indorser's obligations; but the same process of reasoning is applicable to the beneficial holder, who has indorsed his paper for collection, for his obligations to the collecting agent are not those of an indorser,—he can in no event be forced to pay the debt to his collecting agent; yet the rule is well established that he is entitled to notice of dishonor from his agent, and to time thereafter to notify those antecedent to himself in the bill or note. In each case, and alike in both, the object is to facilitate due presentment, without requiring the beneficial holder to go in person and demand payment of the maker, when they reside at different places. The stamp of postmaster at Union City, on back of envelope containing notice to complainant, shows that it reached his office April 14th. Complainant testified that he received his notice "about the 14th or 15th of April," again, "about the 15th of April, 1887;" that at the same time and place, and by mail, he received another notice just like his own, though in a different envelope, and without any instruction or explanation as to use to be made of it, so far as recollected; that "a day or two after" receiving his notice,—“about the 16th or 17th of April,—immediately after” he received his notice, he went to Kenton on a delayed train, and “after night” handed the other notice to the defendant, and told him of the return of the note protested; that he “needed the money on it, and looked to him for it.” Now, assuming that complainant notified defendant exactly as he said he did (though defendant denies it altogether), the notification is not shown to have been in time,—that is, on the next day,—or that any holiday intervened. As to both the day on which he received the notice and that on which he handed it to defendant, he speaks by approximation only, and not with that definiteness and certitude which is required in proving notice of the dishonor of a negotiable instrument. Whether he received the notice on the 14th or on the 15th of the month, and whether he delivered it on the 16th or on the 17th, he did not, and presumably could not, state with certainty. The notice must have been received on the 15th,—the latter of the dates named for reception,—and delivered on the 16th,—the former of the dates named for delivery,—to be in time to bind the indorser. Complainant's recollection with regard to the transaction seems not to have justified him in fixing these two dates definitely; hence he used the indefinite word “about,” and linked with each of these dates another one. His statement that he went to Kenton, to notify defendant, “immediately after” receiving his own notice, did not cure this defect in his testimony, for those words, when considered in connection with the other language used, as must be done, cannot fairly be held to mean the next day. He did not say that it was the next day, as he no doubt would naturally have done, or been required to do by his able counsel, if he knew such to be the fact. The court cannot bring certainty, and that, too, in his favor, out of his own uncertainty. Says Lord Ellenborough, in Lawson v. Sherwood, 1 Starkie, 251: “The witness says ‘two or three days,’ but the third day would be too late. It lies upon you to show that notice was given in due time, and I cannot go upon probable evidence without positive proof of the fact.” This language is quoted in Byles, Bills, 289, as a correct statement of the English rule. Citing the same case, and American authority in addition, another writer says: “The plaintiff must distinctly show that notice was given on the proper day. It will not suffice to show that it was given on one of two days, because the latter would be too late.” Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1051.

Already it has been seen that the fact of formal demand and protest on the 12th of April is amply proven. Whether it is shown to have occurred within reasonable time is yet to be considered. In sending the note for collection the next day after acquiring it, with special instruction to “protest if not paid,” the complainant exercised even greater diligence than the law required of him; and the demand of payment, which seems to have been made by the express agent on the 4th of April, was certainly within a reasonable time after the indorsement. Had the note been then protested, there would have been no room for denying that demand and protest were soon enough. But, in fact, the note was not protested, or attempted to be protested, until the 12th of April, the day on which the express agent seems to have made his second demand, and on which the notary show she made demand. In view of the fact that there had been a demand on the 4th without protest, we are of the opinion that the subsequent demand and protest were not good in law. The demand on the 4th could not be made effectual by protest on the 12th; and, demand having been made on the former date, it was then out of the power of the indorsee to bind the indorser by a second demand on the latter date. Protest on the one day cannot be coupled with demand on the other day; nor can a demand, ineffectual against the indorser because not followed by due protest, be abandoned and another one, without such defect, substituted for it after the lapse of eight days, so as to charge the indorser. That the demands by the express agent may not have been made at the maker's office is unimportant in this litigation, since the maker made no objection on that account. Nor does it help complainant's case that he specially instructed the express company to protest the note if not paid, and had a right to believe that it would be done promptly and legally; for, as between complainant and defendant, the failure of the express company to have proper demand made is chargeable to complainant. It was his agent, and its negligence must be regarded as his negligence in this action.

Again, passing the question of demand and notice altogether, and irrespective of them, it is insisted in behalf of complainant that he is entitled to a recovery on two other grounds: (1) that the maker of the note was insolvent, and known by the defendant to be so at the time of the indorsement, and that he therefore is liable without demand and notice; (3) that defendant admitted his liability for the debt, and took steps to have it paid after the refusal of the maker to pay, thereby superseding the necessity of demand and notice, and rendering himself liable without respect to either. Neither of these grounds of relief was alleged in the bill, but pending the argument of the cause before the chancellor, complainant asked leave to amend so as to include them. Motion to amend was overruled. This action of the court is assigned as error; and, besides, it is urged that without the proposed amendment the facts mentioned should be considered under the original bill, and relief granted accordingly. Premitting the questions of pleading, and also that as to whether insolvency of the maker of a promissory note known to the indorser at the time of indorsement will excuse demand and notice (it was decided in Stothart v. Parker, 1 Overt. (Tenn.) 262, that it would), it is sufficient to say that the fact of insolvency is not established. The Paragould Stave Manufacturing Company is shown to have made an assignment for the benefit of creditors on the 10th of May, 1887, and its assets, administered thereunder, proved insufficient for the payment of its debts. The proof does not show, however, that it was insolvent on the first of April, when the note was indorsed. The impression we get from the rather indefinite testimony on this point is that the business of the company was not at that time in a prosperous condition, but that its assets were to all appearances ample to meet its liabilities if applied for that purpose. The doctrine is well established that if an indorser, with full knowledge that he has been discharged from liability by the failure of his indorsee to make proper demand and give due notice of non-payment, promise to pay the note, or acknowledge his liability therefor, he thereby binds himself, and may be proceeded against as if his liability had been legally fixed in the first instance. To have this effect the promise or acknowledgment must be distinctly made. If it be not unequivocal, or be not with full knowledge of his discharge, it will not avail the indorsee anything. Bogart v. McClung, 11 Heisk. 105; Spurlock v. Union Bank, 4 Humph. 336; Golladay v. Union Bank, 3 Head, 58; Martin v. Ewing, 2 Humph. 559; Williams v. Tennessee Union Bank, 9 Heisk. 441; Bank v. Rawlings, 1 Leg. Rep. 226; Seay v. Ferguson, 1 Tenn. Ch. 293, 294; Gregory v. Allen, Mart. & Y. 76.

It is not claimed that defendant ever promised complainant, or anyone for him, that he would pay the note; hence he must succeed, if he succeed at all, on this branch of the case, on the ground of an acknowledgment or admission of liability. Ware, who, as well as defendant, was a member of the firm of Ware,

Bittick & Co., states that defendant told him at Paragould, between the 15th and 20th of April, 1887, that the note had been protested, and complainant had been to see him about the money; that he (defendant) in same conversation asked witness why the note had not been paid, and "said it would have to be paid." The next two questions and answers are explanatory of defendant's declaration that the note "would have to be paid," and disclose the only admission or evidence of admission supposed to have been made to this witness. They are: "(19) Who did he say would have to pay the note? Answer. We, I think. (20) Who did he mean by 'we'? A. I could not say whether he meant the firm of Ware, Bittick & Co., or the Paragould Stave Manufacturing Company." John Rosson says he had a conversation with defendant at Paragould after the 10th of May; that defendant told him the note had been left out of the assignment, and said "that they would have it to pay." By "they" he understood defendant to mean Ware, Bittick & Co. On the 22d of April, 1887, defendant wrote complainant that he had just been to Paragould, "but failed to accomplish anything as yet;" that if a trade pending there "is accomplished your debt is to be paid off;" and concluded with the statement that he would write again as soon as he should "hear from the parties." On the 27th of May following he wrote complainant in these words: "We were at Paragould last week, and found the business in such condition that we attached all the company's property for what it owed us and you. We [meaning himself and a confidential friend and adviser] put your claim in with ours, and got the business in a shape that it will be closed out as soon as it can be done, and the property all sold. This is the best we could do, as we could see no way to get any cash out of it for you now . . . [Signed] J. R. Carrol."

While these facts show that the defendant thought his firm, which had indorsed the note to complainant, was probably liable to him for its payment, and that he was taking such steps as he deemed best to obtain collection from the maker, they do not establish an admission of liability on his part. They fail to show that explicit acknowledgment of accountability which is necessary to revive the previous obligation, and preclude an indorser from relying on the laches of his indorsee as a discharge. Moreover, there is no proof that what he said and did was said and done with full knowledge that he had previously been discharged. The other assignments of error need not be mentioned further than to say that they relate to rulings of the chancellor on evidence, and that we have considered all the evidence that was competent and none that was incompetent.

John B. ATWATER et al., Respts.,
v.
MANCHESTER SAVINGS BANK et al.,
Appts.

Sampson A. REED, Respt.,
v.
SAME, Appts.

*1. Where land has been conveyed in trust to pay certain charges upon it, and certain specified debts of the grantor, the residuary interest or estate of the grantor is subject to the lien of an attachment or judgment, and to sale on execution. In this State equitable, as well as legal, estates in land are subject to sale on execution.

2. One who has brought suit upon a contract, express or implied, for the payment of money only, and has attached the real estate of the defendant, is "a creditor having a lien," within the meaning of Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 63, § 823, and chapter 81, § 18, relating to the redemption of real estate.

3. In judgment by confession, a statement of the facts out of which the confessed indebtedness arose is sufficient, if it contains enough to enable creditors and others to investigate the bona fides of the judgment.

4. The owner of land, whose title was in litigation, made a contract with his attorney to convey to him, for his services, one third of the land in case he succeeded in recovering the land. The attorney brought the litigation to a successful termination, but in the mean time certain mortgages executed by the owner having been foreclosed, and the time of redemption about to expire, and the owner not being able to redeem, he confessed judgment in favor of his attorney for his services, for an amount which does not appear to have been in excess of the value of one third of the land. The judgment was confessed to enable the attorney to redeem the land, and thereby secure compensation for his services. Held, that the confession of judgment was not a fraud on the purchasers at the mortgage sales.

*Head notes by MITCHELL, J.

NOTE.—Judgment by confession; statement in.

A sworn statement upon which a judgment by confession is based, which states the execution of promissory notes by the defendants and refers to and makes part thereof copies of the notes thereto attached, sufficiently states the facts out of which the indebtedness arose, where the notes recite that they were given "for value received in one sweepstakes separator." Brown v. Barngrover (Iowa) Feb. 6, 1891. See Miller v. Clarke, 37 Iowa, 328; Van Fleet v. Phillips, 11 Iowa, 560.

If the record, as it remains in the circuit court, does not state the facts as they actually occurred, defendant should make application to have the court correct it so as to have it speak the truth. Richardson v. Beldam, 7 West. Rep. 439, 119 Ill. 330, 12 L. R. A.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In each of these cases the question involved is the right of the plaintiffs to redeem from a mortgage sale; and as both grow out of the same general state of facts, and are more or less connected with, and dependent upon, each other, they can be better considered together. So far as material to explain the legal questions involved, the facts are these: A Mrs. Nell, who owed a 40-acre tract of land, but the title of which was then in litigation (Nell v. Dayton, 43 Minn. 242), in March, 1886, executed two mortgages,—one on the west half and the other on the east half of the tract. Default having been made in the conditions of these mortgages, they were both foreclosed, and the premises sold on December 14, 1888. The time for redemption would of course expire December 14, 1889. On August 1, 1889, Mrs. Nell executed to Seagrave Smith the trust-deed, Exhibit A, upon the entire tract. On December 12, 1889, Atwater & Hill commenced an action against Mrs. Nell to recover a debt which they alleged she owed them for services as attorneys, and on the same day caused an attachment to be issued in the action, and levied on the whole tract. On December 14, 1889, Mrs. Nell confessed judgment in favor of plaintiff Reed for a debt due him for services performed and money expended for her as attorney. This judgment was docketed on the same day. On December 14, 1889, Atwater & Hill and Reed each filed notices of intention to redeem from both foreclosure sales,—Atwater & Hill under their attachment lien, and Reed under his judgment lien. Smith had never done anything with the land under the trust deed, Exhibit A, nor did either he or Mrs. Nell make any redemption. Within five days after the expiration of one year from the date of the sales, and on December 19, Atwater & Hill did everything necessary to effect a redemption of the west half of the tract, but made no attempt to redeem the east half. Within five days thereafter, and on December 21, Reed did everything necessary to effect a redemption of the east half. But in both cases the sheriff, who made the sales, and the defendant bank, who held the certificates of sale, refused to accept the money or to execute certificates of redemption. Hence these suits to compel them to do so.

1. The first question that arises is whether, after the execution to Smith of Exhibit A, Mrs. Nell had remaining any interest or estate in the land upon which plaintiff's attachment and judgment were liens; for if not, then plaintiffs were not "creditors having a lien," and had no right to redeem. Counsel have discussed at great length the questions whether Exhibit A was a trust or merely a power in trust, and, if the former, whether it was valid under the Statute of Uses and Trusts. Under the view we have taken of the case, it becomes unnecessary to consider these questions. We shall assume that the instrument is all that defendants claim it to be, viz., a valid trust,—a conveyance of the land to Smith in trust to pay certain charges upon it and to pay certain specified debts of the grantor. Defendants' contention is that, as thus construed, it vested in Smith the whole estate in the land, so that no title or interest remained in Mrs. Nell to which a lien could attach. That she had a residuary interest in the land cannot be questioned. The deed itself expressly provides that, "if there be more than sufficient to pay all of said claims in the manner as aforesaid, then the said trustee shall grant, convey and set over to said Nell, her heirs," etc., "all of the rest and remainder of said property." This is nothing more than the law would imply, for such a residuary interest necessarily arises in every case where property is assigned in trust to pay debts or to satisfy other specified objects. Had Mrs. Nell herself paid all the charges and debts specified in the deed of trust, the entire beneficial interest in the land would have been in her. Or if the trustee had accomplished all the purposes of the trust by executing mortgages, the land subject to the mortgages would have been hers. So if he had accomplished these purposes by selling only a part of the land, the residue would have been hers. In speaking of the similar residuary interest of a bankrupt in real estate assigned to an assignee in bankruptcy, this court said that it may be classified under our Statute (Gen. Stat. chap. 45, §§ 12, 33) as a reversion, subject to be defeated by a sale by the assignee; that after the purposes of the trust are accomplished the residuum of the property would revert by operation of law without any reconveyance. King v. Remington, 36 Minn. 15-32. If this be so, then Mrs. Nell's interest in the land was subject to the lien of an attachment or judgment, and to sale on execution, for, of course, a reversion in land is a legal estate. But if her interest was merely an equitable one, the same result would follow. At common law the rule undoubtedly was that a mere equitable estate in land could not be sold on execution, for the familiar reason that courts of law did not recognize equitable estates, and could not deal with them. But a judgment creditor was not in such cases without remedy. He could file his bill in a court of chancery, which always held that, for its purposes, these equitable interests were just as much bound by the judgment as legal estates, and could be subjected to its satisfaction by equitable process; and in adjusting the conflicting rights of creditors it always followed, by analogy, the rules of the common law. It is true that the courts of chancery held that the lien or right to obtain satisfaction out of the specific property sought to be subjected to sale for that purpose dated from the filing of the bill. But this was also in strict analogy with the law, for at common law the judgment was not a lien on real property, but it was the judgment creditor who first extended the land by elegit, or whose execution was first begun to be executed, who was entitled to priority; and a bill in equity to reach the property for the satisfaction of a judgment was considered as being in the nature of an equitable execution. But when the law was changed so as to make judgments liens from the date of their docketing there can be no reason why a court of equity, still following the analogy of the law, should not and would not hold that equitable interests in land were subject to the liens of judgments in the order of their priority in date. See Hale v. Horne, 21 Gratt. 112. The modern tendency of both courts and Legislatures is, as far as possible, to do away with the distinction between legal and equitable estates. The old rule that a judgment lien did not attach to a more equity has been abolished in England, and in the great majority of the States of the American Union, by statutes expressly declaring that a judgment shall be a lien on all the interests of the judgment debtor in real estate, whether legal or equitable. In Pennsylvania the same result is reached without the aid of a statute, upon the ground that, as they have no courts of chancery from which the creditor might have relief, therefore, from necessity, they must establish the principle that both judgments and executions have an immediate operation on equitable estates. Auwerter v. Mathiot, 9 Serg. & R. 402. In this State there is no express statute declaring that a judgment shall be a lien on an equitable estate, but when we consider that the common-law rule on the subject was purely technical, and arose out of the supposed inability of courts of law to deal with equitable estates, and that in this State all distinction between courts of law and courts of equity has been done away with, and that the same court now administers both legal and equitable remedies in the same action, it must be evident that all reasons for the old rule have ceased to exist. And there is nothing in our Statutes indicating any intention to retain any distinction in this respect between legal and equitable estates. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 277, provides that "the judgment, from the time of docketing the same, becomes a lien on all the real property of the debtor;" and section 800 of the same chapter provides that "all property, real, personal or mixed, . . . may be levied upon and sold on execution." This language is certainly broad enough to include both legal and equitable interests in real property; and, in view of all the circumstances, we do not think it is going too far to hold, as we do, that it was so intended, and that now any interest or estate, either legal or equitable (at least if a vested one), of the debtor, is subject to the lien of an attachment or judgment, and to sale on execution. The decision of this court that the interest of a vendee under an executory contract for the sale of land is subject to the lien of a judgment, and to sale on execution, proceeds, and can only be sustained, upon this ground. McCarthy v. Van Der Mey, 42 Minn. 189.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that Mrs. Nell had an interest in this land which was subject to the liens of plaintiffs' attachment and judgment.

2. The next question which arises in the case of Atwater & Hill is whether an attaching creditor who has not yet obtained judgment is "a creditor having a lien, legal or equitable," within the meaning of Gen. Stat., chap. 66, § 823, and chapter 81, § 16.

A "creditor," even in the strict technical sense of the term, is anyone who has a right to require the fulfillment of an obligation or contract for the payment of money,—anyone who has a debt or demand against another upon contract, express or implied, for the payment of money. A "lien" is defined as a hold or claim which one person has upon the property of another as security for some debt or charge. And while an attachment on mesne process differs in some respects from either common-law, maritime or equitable liens, yet it is a statutory lien, constituting a hold on the property of the defendant, for the payment of such judgment as the plaintiff may recover. Both in statutes and the decisions of courts it is everywhere denominated a "lien." Hence one who has brought an action upon a contract for the payment of money only, as did Atwater & Hill, and attached the property of the defendant, is "a creditor having a lien," within the ordinary and literal meaning of that expression. But defendant's contention is that the liens to which the Statute refers are those which he terms absolute and perfect,—fixed and definite,—either by judicial determination, or by the contract of the parties, as by judgment or mortgage; that the Statute does not refer to or include a mere provisional and inchoate lien like that of an attachment on mesne process. No such limitation is to be found in the language of the Statute itself, and if it is to be imported into it by implication the reasons for it must be found elsewhere. Such a limitation of this apparently unambiguous language can only be justified on the grounds, either that it is implied from other provisions of statute on the same subject, or that a literal construction is inconsistent with the general purpose of the laws, or would be impracticable, and lead to unreasonable or absurd results. The Statute provides for two kinds of redemption,—one, within a year after sale by the mortgagor or judgment debtor or his assigns, which annuls the sale, and which, for convenience, may be called an "owner's" redemption; the other, after the expiration of the year, by creditors, which operates as an assignment of the right acquired under the sale, and which may be called a "creditor's" redemption. Both are made out of court, by the mere act of the parties, without any judicial determination of their rights. This "creditor's" redemption is wholly the creation of statute, and unlike anything known to equity jurisprudence. The great object of it is to have the debtor's property go, as far as possible, towards the payment of his debt; and this is for the benefit of both debtor and creditor. This being the policy of the law, it is just as much to the interest of the debtor to have a debt satisfied which is not in judgment or secured by mortgage as one which is; and a creditor whose claim is not in judgment or secured by mortgage is just as much entitled to have his debt paid as a judgment creditor or mortgagee. So there is nothing in the policy of the law which requires any such restricted construction of its language as contended for by defendants. Neither is there anything in the history of legislation on the subject in this State as to indicate that the law-makers intended to use the language in any such limited sense. Under the Revised Statutes of 1851 (chap. 71, §§ 112-117), in case of an execution sale, a "creditor's" redemption was in express terms limited to judgment creditors and mortgagees; and in case of a mortgage sale (chap. 85, § 11) no "creditor's" redemption was allowed at all, unless it was under section 18, to mortgagees, which, however, seems to have been an "owner's" redemption, which annulled the sale. This remained the state of the law until the enactment of chapter 60, Laws 1858 (Comp. Stat. 1858, p. 646), amending section 115, chap. 71, Rev. Stat., which attempted, although in a very crude manner, to provide a comprehensive system of redemption from all "sales upon the execution, judgment, order or decree of any court of this State, or upon the foreclosure, by advertisement or otherwise, of any mortgage, contract or liability." This Act provided for an "owner's" redemption within one year from the date of sale; also that "other creditors of the original judgment debtor or mortgagor" might also redeem within the year, the owner, however, having a right to redeem within a year from each such redemption. The expression "other creditors" was not defined, although the use of the word "other" would seem to imply that they were creditors of the same class as those by whom the property had been sold, that is, creditors having a judgment decree, order or mortgage upon which the premises might be sold, which would leave the right of redemption as limited as before. That it did not mean creditors generally, is apparent from the fact that section 117, chap. 71, providing what proof a redemptioner should produce, was left unchanged. The Act of 1862 (Laws 1862, chap. 19) made no change in respect to the parties who had a right to redeem, although section 5 made some changes in regard to the proof which a redemptioner should produce, which, however, are not here important. The next change was by the Statutes of 1866, which revised the whole law on the subject, and left it in substantially the same shape in which we have it to-day. In making this revision, the commissioners retained many of the provisions of previous Acts, but introduced some entirely new sections, particularly section 328, chap. 66, and section 16, chap. 81, Gen. Stat. 1878, in which, for the first time, appeared the expression, "a creditor having a lien, legal or equitable." Section 5 of the Act of 1862, providing what proof a redemptioner should produce, was retained without change, and is now found as section 325 of chapter 66 and section 14 of chapter 81.

vision of 1866 was made, in every other State (some fifteen in number), with one possible exception, in which a "creditor's" redemption after sale was allowed, as well as in our own State, at least under the Statutes of 1851, the right was limited in express terms to creditors having a lien by mortgage, judgment or decree. It is highly probable that the commissioners were familiar with this fact, and had it in mind when introducing changes in our Statutes. And if they intended to incorporate or retain any such limitation in our laws it would seem that they would have expressed it in plain and unambiguous language. The fact that they did not, but on the contrary coined and adopted a new expression of their own, strongly indicates that they intended to extend the right of redemption beyond what had previously obtained here or elsewhere, and that they used the phrase "a creditor having a lien" in its common and literal sense. In support of his contention that an attachment is not a lien, counsel quotes some remarks of Judge Story in Ex parte Foeter, 2 Story, 181, to the effect that an attachment was not a lien within the meaning of section 2 of the Bankrupt Act of 1841; that it did not come up to the exact definition or meaning of a lien in the general sense of either a common-law, maritime or equitable lien; which is perhaps true. But, as against his construction of the Act referred to, we may cite Kittredge v. Warren, 14 N. H. 509; Same v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 227; and Davenport v. Tilton, 10 Met. 320,—in which last case Judge Shaw very pertinently remarks that, in the construction of Statutes, not much aid can be derived from considerations of mere expediency or general equity; that, however strongly they may influence the Legislature in forming statutes, they cannot change their construction when the terms are not doubtful. Neither do we find, in other provisions of statute relating to redemptions, anything that, by implication or otherwise, excludes attaching creditors from the class of redemptioners. The only one that has any bearing upon the question is the section providing what proof a proposed redemptioner must produce. The requirements of that section (sec. 14, chap. 81) clearly imply that the lien must be of record. This is implied, not only from the nature of the proof required, but also from the fact that it is essential for the purpose of fixing the order in which parties are to exercise the right of redemption. But an attachment lien on real property is as much a matter of record as the lien of a mortgage or judgment. The requirement of an affidavit of the amount actually due would, by implication, limit the term "creditor" to its strict and proper sense, of one who has a claim for money due on contract, to the exclusion of those whose claims are for unliquidated damages, at least in actions for torts, who could not well make such an affidavit. See Fisher v. Consequa, 2 Wash. C. C. 382. But we see no serious difficulty of this kind in the case of a demand due on a contract for the payment of money, where the contract itself, either expressly or by implication of law, furnishes the standard.

by which the amount of the debt is to be measured.

Much stress is laid by counsel upon the supposed practical difficulties and evils which would arise from allowing redemptions on attachment liens, where the plaintiff may never obtain judgment, or where his attachment may be vacated. While there is some force in these suggestions, yet they go to the expediency of the Statute, rather than its construction. The objections obtain with greater or less force to all redemptions out of court, without any judicial determination as to the rights of the parties. Even if the right of redemption be limited to mortgage and judgment creditors, it may prove, after the redemption has been made, that the mortgage or judgment was void, or had been previously satisfied. But these difficulties are more imaginary than real. Our impression is that it has been the general understanding of the bar that attaching creditors were redemptioners under the Statute, and yet we have never heard of many serious complications growing out of such a construction of the law. And the fact that the profession has generally put this construction upon the Statute for so many years is an additional, although not a controlling, reason why the courts should adopt it. An illustration of how the Statute has been generally construed is to be found in Kling v. Childs, 80 Minn. 366, in which, while the point was not raised, both counsel and court seem to have assumed that an attaching creditor had a right to redeem.

8. In the Reed Case the defendants attack the validity of the plaintiff's judgment on two grounds: (1) that the statement for judgment is on its face insufficient, for the reason that it does not state the facts out of which the confessed indebtedness arose; and (2) that the judgment was fraudulent, and not confessed for any actual indebtedness. The statement is that "the said indebtedness is due from me, the said Nell, to said Reed, on account of services and moneys paid out by Scagrove, Smith and said Reed, late co-partners as Smith & Reed, paid and performed at my special instance and request, between the first day of October, 1887, and the first day of March, 1889, and that said amount has not been paid, but is now all justly due and owing; that the said Smith & Reed, for a valuable consideration to them paid prior to the confession of this judgment, sold, assigned and set over the same to the said Reed." This is a good statement, even as against subsequent creditors, in whose favor such statements are strictly construed, and who would stand in a much better position to attack them than do these defendants. Formerly some courts were inclined to hold with exceeding strictness against statements for confessions of judgment, when attacked by creditors; but the general doctrine of the later cases is to the effect that the requirement that the facts be stated out of which the indebtedness arose is intended to enable other creditors to test the bona fides of the transaction by which a particular debt is preferred; that it is not the object of the Statute to compel the debtor to state sufficient of the transaction to enable other creditors to form an opinion, from the fact stated, as to the integrity of the debtor in confessing judgment, but that all that is required is to state facts sufficient to enable them to investigate the transaction, and form their opinion of the honesty of the judgment from the facts thus ascertained. McDowell v. Daniels, 88 Barb. 148; Harrison v. Gibbons, 71 N. Y. 59; Kern v. Chalfant, 7 Minn. 487 (Gil. 898); Cleveland Co-op. Store Co. v. Douglas, 27 Minn. 177. This in substance is recognized as the correct rule in Wells v. Gieseke, 27 Minn. 478. Tested by any such rule, the statement in this case is amply sufficient. Plaintiff contends that the defendants cannot attack the judgment collaterally in this action on the second ground. Passing this question without deciding it, we are of opinion that the evidence does not sustain this objection to the judgment. It appears that, the title to this property being in litigation, Mrs. Nell employed Smith & Reed as her attorneys in the matter, and made a contract with them to give them for their services and expenditures in her behalf, in case of their success, one third of the land upon termination of the suit; that in pursuance of this agreement they performed services and expended money, and prosecuted the suit to a successful termination, but in the mean time, by reason of the foreclosures already referred to, the land was about to be wholly lost to both her and them, she being unable to redeem. In this juncture of affairs, Mrs. Nell, recognizing her obligation to them for their successful services, for the purpose of enabling them to secure compensation out of the land by redeeming it, confessed judgment in their favor for a sum of money that is not shown to be greater than the value of the share of land to which they were entitled, thereby changing her liability to them from an obligation to convey them one third of the land to an absolute moneyed indebtedness to the amount of the confessed judgment. She had a perfect right to do this, if she saw fit, and it constituted no fraud on the defendants. She might, under her original contract, have conveyed them one third of the land, which would have given them the same right to redeem the whole that they had under this judgment. Neither is the amount of the judgment important to them, as it might have been to subsequent creditors, because, if it had been for one dollar, it would have given the same right to redeem, and by paying precisely the same amount, as if it had been for a million. Under any circumstances, the defendants receive the full amount due them, and interest, and we fail to see how they have any grounds for complaint.

Orders affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (3d Div.).

Michael RODDY, Respt.,

v.

MISSOURI PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A railroad company which has contracted to furnish cars for stone at a quarry is not liable to a servant of the other party to the contract for injuries resulting from any breach of duty arising purely under the contract; but if it was charged with the duty of selecting the cars it is liable to such servant for injuries resulting from a failure to use ordinary care to provide cars which are reasonably safe.
2. A car with defective brakes is not such an imminently dangerous instrument as to make the owner liable for the simple act of leaving it upon the track, to one who is injured by it, if he has no contractual or other relation to the owner.
3. A servant is not justified in assuming that a car furnished his employer by a railroad company is in good repair and supplied with proper brakes, if he knows that of other cars so furnished many have been defective.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Johnson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Priest and Adams & Buckner, for appellant:

The court erred in refusing to give the defendant's instruction, at the close of the evidence, that the plaintiff could not recover.

Actionable negligence consists in the failure to exercise ordinary care or skill towards a person to whom the defendant owes the duty of observing ordinary care, by which failure the plaintiff, without contributory negligence on his part, has suffered injury to his person or property.

Privity of contract is not always essential to create a liability in the case; it may arise as well out of the relative situation of the parties.

The injury complained of was not due to any negligence on the part of Roddy or his master in handling the car with the defective brake after it was furnished by the Railway Company, but was due wholly to its act in furnishing a car with a defective brake. The company could not shift its responsibility for this default on to Pickle, who was in no way responsible.

Lancaster v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra; Horne v. Nicholson, 56 Mo. 220.

Notwithstanding that Roddy was on the track and handling the property of appellant, he did not become its servant thereby, nor was he merely a volunteer, for he was engaged at the moment of the injury in expediting the work of his master.

Hanna v. Chattanooga & N. R. Co. 6 L. R. A. 727, 88 Tenn. 810.

The causal connection between the acts of defendant in furnishing the car with the defective brake and the injury of plaintiff is so plain that there is no room for any doubt about it.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages on account of serious personal injuries received by plaintiff by reason of alleged negligence on the part of defendant in furnishing a defective car which plaintiff was required to handle. The petition charges and the evidence shows that the main line of defendant's road between St. Louis and Kansas City passes through the Town of Warrensburg, in Johnson County; that about three miles northwest of the Town of Warrensburg are extensive stone quarries owned and operated by one Pickle. Defendant owns and operates a branch railroad running out from Warrensburg to these quarries, which is used for transporting the stone taken from the quarries. From this branch road, at a point near the quarry, was a switch, which connected the road with another railroad track running into the quarry. This latter track was owned by Pickle, and was used for loading stone upon the cars. Cars intended for transportation of stone were brought out on this branch road, and were left standing on this quarry track, or convenient thereto, by defendant, and were then handled by Pickle until loaded, when they were carried out by defendant. Plaintiff at the time of his injury was in the employ of Pickle, working in the quarry, and had been so employed for about thirteen years. At the time of his injury a part of his duty was to load stone into the cars by means of a derrick erected near the quarry and quarry track. After the empty cars had been placed on the quarry track they were managed, controlled, and, when necessary, moved to proper position for loading, by Pickle and the men in his employ. This duty of moving cars frequently devolved upon plaintiff. The grade to the quarry from the branch road was descending, and brakes were required to hold cars in position. Plaintiff testified, in substance, that on the 18th of June, Antoine Pickle, manager of the quarry, directed him to load a car with stone. Two flat-cars stood upon the quarry track, 50 or 60 feet from the derrick. He got upon the north car, nearest the derrick, and found the brakes set. He walked on top of the cars to the back end of the south car, and, as he supposed, set the brake tight on that one. He then uncoupled the cars, let the brake off the north one, sat on the end of the other, and with his feet put the north car in motion. He then got down on the ground between the cars, and with his hands—one on the draw-head, and the other on the end of the car—commenced pushing the car to the derrick. He had moved but a short distance when the south car struck him, crushing his arm, and causing permanent injury. It appeared from other evidence that while the brake, from what could be seen from the top of the car, and from what could be known from turning it, appeared to be in good condition, it was found that the rod connecting the brakes beneath the car was down, and the brake-shoe was in consequence too low to touch the wheel, and turning the brakes in the usual way did not set the shoe against the wheel. The brake was, in that condition, wholly useless. When the first car was moved out of the way, the second was set in motion by its own weight, and followed the first on the descending grade, and struck plaintiff as stated. The evidence showed further that the defect in this brake could have been easily detected by an examination beneath the car. Cars were frequently sent out with defective brakes. Plaintiff testified himself that "half the time they had no brakes on them." Pickle kept chains, which were used in making temporary repairs of the brakes, and this one could have been easily repaired with such chain. The superintendent of the quarry usually examined the cars, and notified the employes if any were defective. The contract between Pickle and the Railroad Company, if in writing, was not offered in evidence. From the testimony of Pickle, the superintendent, the arrangement between them was that defendant should furnish cars at the quarry when requested. The cars were left on the track near the quarry, and were handled at the quarry and loaded by the men employed and paid by Pickle. Defendant had no control over Pickle's men. After the cars were loaded they were billed from the quarry to their destination and charges for transportation were paid from the quarry. Defendant, when notified, received at the quarry, and carried off, the loaded cars. Defendant's answer was a general denial and plea of contributory negligence. Defendant offered no evidence, and asked no instruction except in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, which was refused. At the request of the plaintiff the court gave to the jury the following instructions: "(1) The court instructs the jury that if you should find and believe from all the evidence in the case that at the time of the injury complained of by plaintiff he was engaged at work in the employment of one Pickle and in his interest, and that defendant had furnished cars to said Pickle to be loaded by him with stone belonging to said Pickle for transportation by defendant over its road for pay, on or about the 18th day of June, 1886; that of the cars so furnished by defendant there was one the brake of which needed repairing at the time the same was furnished, and for the want of such repairing was insufficient, with proper use and management, to fasten, manage and control said car; and that defendant knew of the condition of the brake, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known its condition; and that plaintiff did not know the condition of said brake until the happening of the injury complained of, and the defect in said brake was not patent to plaintiff, or such as would have been disclosed to him had he been ordinarily observant; and that plaintiff, while engaged in the service of said Pickle, loading another of defendant's cars, the car to which was fixed the brake being out of repair ran down and against plaintiff, whereby he was hurt, injured and damaged; and that the injury occurred without the fault or negligence of plaintiff contributing thereto,—then your findings should be for plaintiff. (2) The court instructs the jury that if you should find and believe from all the evidence in the case that the defendant furnished cars to said Pickle to be by him loaded with stone at his quarries for transportation over its railroad, then it became and was the duty of the defendant to have furnished cars provided with appliances in such a state of repair as that the said Pickle and his employes could, with proper management and reasonable care and prudence, safely manage and control same while so engaged in said work. And if you should find that plaintiff, before the time of the alleged injury, did not know that defendant's cars were not in such condition or repair, he had a right to presume that defendant had done its duty, and that the appliances to said car were in such state of repair and condition as to safely manage and control said cars, with proper use and management, to do the work for which such appliances were designed, and to rely and act upon such presumption." "(4) The court further instructs the jury, if you should find and believe from the evidence in the case that the plaintiff did not know of the alleged condition of the brake referred to in the testimony, until after the happening to him of the injury referred to in testimony, and that the condition of said brake would not have been observed by him by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable prudence and observation on his part, it was not incumbent on plaintiff to search for and examine for defects in its condition not so observable, but that he had the right to assume that such brake was in a suitable and safe condition as to its being repaired; that it would, with proper management, do the work for which it was designed." The jury found for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $6,000. Defendant appealed.

The action is for negligence. It is charged in the petition "that it was the duty of said defendant to furnish cars to said Pickle, properly constructed, and provided with suitable and safe brakes, properly constructed and sufficiently repaired, and in condition to manage, hold, control and stop its said cars; but plaintiff charges that the said defendant, by its carelessness and negligence, failed to furnish cars so properly constructed, and with suitable and safe brakes, constructed and sufficiently repaired to manage, hold and control the same." Definitions of actionable negligence have been given in great variety of forms by courts and text-writers, but, whatever the form of simple definition, there is unanimity of expression and opinion that it consists in the breach or non-performance of some duty which the party charged with the negligent act or omission owed to the one suffering loss or damage thereby. Brett, M. R., in Heaven v. Pender, 17 Rep. 511, defines "actionable negligence" "to consist in the failure to exercise ordinary care or skill towards a person to whom the defendant owes the duty of observing ordinary care, by which failure the plaintiff, without contributory negligence on his part, has suffered injury to his person or property." This definition is cited and approved by counsel for plaintiff, and may be accepted for the purposes of this case. The question then, is, Did defendant owe plaintiff the duty of using ordinary care to furnish cars in which to load stone, which were properly constructed and provided with suitable brakes? It is insisted that the duty arose either out of the contract between defendant and Pickle, or by virtue of the relationship between plaintiff and defendant, arising out of their respective duties under the contract. Assuming that the contract between defendant and Pickle either expressly or by implication imposed upon the former the duty to supply the latter with cars provided with suitable brakes, and that there was a breach of that duty, whereby plaintiff was injured, does the contract afford him indemnity for his injuries? The right of a third party to maintain an action for injuries resulting from a breach of a contract between two contracting parties has been denied by the overwhelming weight of authority of the state and federal courts of this country and the courts of England. To hold that such actions could be maintained would not only lead to endless complications in following out cause and effect, but would restrict and embarrass the right to make contracts by burdening them with obligations and liabilities to others which parties would not voluntarily assume. Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109; Burdick v. Chendle, 26 Ohio St. 893; Maguire v. McGee (Pa.) 12 Cent. Rep. 414; Necker v. Harrey, 49 Mich. 518; District of Columbia Nat. Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621; Deford v. State, 30 Md. 195; Marrin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. L. 19; Sprout v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick. 1; Mann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 86 Mo. 350; Lampert v. Laclede Gas-Light Co. 14 Mo. App. 376; Gordon v. Livingston, 12 Mo. App. 267. The rule is put upon two grounds, either of which is unquestionably sound. One ground is given by the court in the opinion in Winterbottom v. Wright, as follows: "If we were to hold that plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract. If we go one step beyond that there is no reason why we should not go fifty." The other ground is thus stated in the New Jersey case above cited: "The object of parties in inserting in their contracts specific undertakings with respect to the work to be done is to create an obligation inter se. These engagements and undertakings must necessarily be subject to modifications and waiver by the contracting parties. If third persons can acquire a right in a contract in the nature of a duty to have it performed as contracted for, the parties will be deprived of control over their own contracts." Plaintiff, not being a party to the contract, cannot maintain this action on account of injuries resulting from any breach of duty defendant owed Pickle, 12 L. R. A.

2. It is clear from the evidence that plaintiff was in no sense the servant or employé of defendant. He was employed and paid by Pickle, and was subject only to his control and direction. Defendant had no authority over him, had no power to discharge him for any cause, and had no contract with him. The relation between plaintiff and defendant was not that of master and servant, and the rules of law peculiarly applicable to the duties and liabilities of one to the other have no application. Plaintiff shows no cause of action growing out of any duty defendant owed him arising from the relationship of master and servant. Wood, Mast. and S. §§ 1, 281; Speed v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 71 Mo. 808.

3. There is a class of cases in which one has been held liable to another in the absence of any contractual or other relationship between them. The rule in such cases is laid down in Sutherland on Damages (vol. 2, p. 485), as follows: "Where an act of negligence is imminently dangerous to the lives of others the guilty party is liable to the one injured by the negligence, whether there be a contract between them violated by that negligence or not." The principle is illustrated by the case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397. That was a case in which a dealer in drugs had carelessly labeled a poison as harmless medicine, and sent it, so labeled, into the market. It was held that the dealer was liable to any person who might be injured by the use of the drug. In considering what articles can be regarded imminently dangerous, the same court, in Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 357, says: "They are instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury to mankind, and are generally intended to accomplish that purpose; they are essentially and in their elements instruments of danger." It cannot reasonably be contended that a railroad car, though supplied with defective brakes, is an imminently dangerous instrument. Unless put in motion it is perfectly harmless, and when in motion it is not essentially dangerous. We do not think defendant incurred any liability to plaintiff by the simple act of leaving a defective car upon the track. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 47 Ill. 265; Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 93 Mo. 445, 12 West. Rep. 330.

4. What, then, was the true relationship between these parties, and what, if any, duty did defendant owe to plaintiff, as the employé of Pickle? Defendant was engaged in the general business of a common carrier. It operated a railroad between St. Louis and Kansas City. Pickle was the owner of large and valuable stone quarries, situated some distance from defendant's road. The stone taken from these quarries was merchantable, and was a subject of commerce. The stone was of value only when it could be transported to market. It thus became a matter of mutual interest and profit to defendant and Pickle to provide means for the transportation of this merchandise from the quarry to points at which it could be sold. A contract was entered into between them, by which defendant built a branch or spur road from its main line to the quarries, and also tracks from this spur into the quarries. These were paid for by Pickle. In order to facilitate the transportation of stone, which was beneficial to both parties, it was agreed that defendant should, when cars were needed, place them on the quarry tracks, or conveniently near to them, and that Pickle should move them, when needed, into position for loading, and when loaded defendant should take them out, and transport them to their destination. Plaintiff was employed by Pickle,—a part of his duty consisting in moving and handling these cars. It did not appear from the evidence what, if any, compensation Pickle received for loading the cars. The manner of conducting the business is thus detailed by Pickle, superintendent: "The Missouri Pacific Railway built that track on the west side of the quarry. Pickle paid for it. The company claims it. They simply constructed it for Pickle. About shipping stone, the bill reads from Warrensburg, of course; but the freight commences from the quarry. The person to whom these cars are sent pays the freight. As to rates, they allowed us a certain amount off from Warrensburg to the quarry. I believe it is $2.50 or $5. The freight is included from the quarry, not from town. We don't charter these cars to haul stone to the main line, but charter the cars to wherever the cars are consigned. We don't simply charter the cars to haul the stone from the quarry to Warrensburg. If we have orders to Warrensburg we bill to Warrensburg. All that the railroad company had to do with the movement of these cars is simply to haul the empties out there, and when we have loaded them the engine comes out and takes them away; that is all they have to do with it. That is not the first car that they sent out there that was out of fix. I have seen as many as ten cars standing there with only two brakes on them."

Under this evidence it is clear that what was to be done by the respective parties under the contract was for their mutual profit, and each was a contractor with the other to perform a particular part of the work necessary to carry out the common purpose. It is now well established that the employer of a contractor is not responsible for the negligence of the contractor or his servants in case the contractor is given entire freedom in the use of means to accomplish the result. Where the employer, however, reserved the right to direct the manner of performance in any particular, or where he undertakes to provide any of the instrumentalities, he owes to the contractor and his employes the duty of care in respect to such matters over which he retains control, or undertakes to perform. Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 172-174; Wood, Mast. and S. § 337; Stewart v. Harvard College, 12 Allen, 58; Lancaster v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 92 Mo. 480, 10 West. Rep. 409; Horner v. Nicholson, 56 Mo. 220; Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470; Coughtry v. Globe Woolen Co. 56 N. Y. 124; Deford v. State, 30 Md. 179; Lake Superior Iron Co. v. Erickson, 39 Mich. 492; Smith v. New 12 L. R. A.

York & H. R. Co. 19 N. Y. 127; Hanna v. Chattanooga & N. R. Co. 88 Tenn. 810, 6 L. R. A. 727; Killian v. Augusta & K. R. Co. 79 Ga. 241; Conlon v. Eastern R. Co. 185 Mass. 195, 15 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 99.

We think each of these contracting parties owed to the other and his employes the duty of properly discharging his part of the joint undertaking in respect to any matter exclusively devolving upon him. Pickle had nothing to do with selecting or providing the cars. That duty was intrusted entirely to defendant. They were intended for the use of Pickle and his servants in discharging his part of the contract, and we think the obligation rested upon defendant to use ordinary care to provide such as would be reasonably safe for such use.

5. The evidence does not show conclusively such contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff as should, as a matter of law, preclude a recovery. Plaintiff, in testifying as a witness, it is true, admitted that one half the cars furnished Pickle by defendant were without brakes. On the other hand, Pickle's superintendent testified that he generally examined the cars himself, and, if any were found defective, he gave notice of such defects to those who handled them. Whether, under these circumstances, and the fact that the brakes appeared, from plaintiff's position on top of the car, and from his efforts to set them, to be in good condition, plaintiff used such precautions as ordinary care and prudence required of him, was a question for the jury. It is not every case in which there is no conflict in the facts that the court will declare, as a matter of law, the legal effect of the evidence. If upon all the facts and circumstances there is room for fair and sensible men to differ in their conclusion the jury should decide. Petty v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 88 Mo. 306, 8 West. Rep. 297; Buesching v. St. Louis Gas-Light Co. 73 Mo. 219; Reilly v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 94 Mo. 609, 13 West. Rep. 658; Thorpe v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 89 Mo. 651, 6 West. Rep. 671; 8 Wood, Railway Law, 1460; Wood, Mast. and S. 761.

6. The instruction, in directing the jury that plaintiff had the right to assume that defendant would furnish Pickle with cars properly supplied with brakes, in good repair and condition, properly declared the law as applied to the duty a master owes his servant. But if the servant was informed by the master, or had learned by observation, or from any other source, that some of the instrumentalities furnished him were defective and dangerous, and, without promise that they would be repaired, he continued in the master's service, then the risk of injury from such defective instrumentalities would become an incident to such service, which he would assume. Price v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 77 Mo. 508; Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 71 Mo. 66; Devitt v. Pacific R. Co. 50 Mo. 302; Thorpe v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 89 Mo. 650, 6 West. Rep. 671.

While the relation of master and servant did not exist between these parties, defendant owed to plaintiff the observance of reasonable care in the selection of its cars for his use, which is the same degree of care the master is required to observe in providing his servant with the instrumentalities for carrying on his business. No reason can be seen why, if plaintiff knew that defective and dangerous cars were frequently left for his use, he would not assume the risk of injuries from such defects as could have been ascertained by reasonable inspection on his part. While defendant may have been negligent in the discharge of the duties it owed to plaintiff, if plaintiff neglected such precautions as common prudence demanded under all the circumstances, he was guilty of contributory negligence, which should have defeated a recovery. In view of the fact that plaintiff himself testified that one half the cars were without brakes, it was not proper to instruct the jury that he had the right to rely on defendant's performance of its duty in furnishing such as were properly supplied with brakes. The knowledge plaintiff had of the common neglect of defendant imposed upon him, for his own protection and safety, the duty of reasonable care in ascertaining for himself the condition of the cars before he attempted to handle them, and a failure to do so would constitute contributory negligence on his part. Whether such care was used on the occasion of his injury should have been submitted to the jury.

For the errors mentioned the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

All concur.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA

v.

John BAXTER, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(....Pa....)

A certificate by the register of unpaid taxes that he finds none against certain land is conclusive in favor of one who purchases the land in reliance upon the certificate.

(May 12, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant Baxter from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Philadelphia County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of delinquent taxes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas B. Taylor, for appellant:

The certificate should have been admitted as evidence of an estoppel.

Acts and admissions of the officers of municipal corporations in the line of their official duty and within the scope of their authority are binding upon the body they represent.

Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 237, note 1, p. 262.

The acts of the receiver in this case are the acts of the City.

Philadelphia v. Matchett, 7 Cent. Rep. 907, 116 Pa. 103; Lawrence v. Philadelphia, 14 W. N. C. 421.

Where the conduct of a party has been such as to induce action by another, he shall be precluded from afterwards asserting, to the prejudice of that other, the contrary of that of which his conduct has induced the belief.

Following are several cases from other States illustrating the doctrine of estoppel as applied to municipal corporations:

Curnen v. New York, 79 N. Y. 518, 520; Union Depot Co. v. St. Louis, 76 Mo. 894; New Haven, M. & W. R. Co. v. Chatham, 42 Conn. 465; Society for Savings v. New London, 29 Conn. 193; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 91 Ill. 251; Martel v. East St. Louis, 94 Ill. 67.

Messrs. Isaac H. Shields, Abraham M. Bettler and Charles F. Warwick for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the recent case of Crouse v. Murphy, (Pa.) 12 L. R. A. 58, in which an opinion was filed at the present term, we had occasion to note the evident purpose pervading the legislation of this State to protect bona fide purchasers of real estate against unrecorded liens and incumbrances. The same general subject is brought to our attention from a different standpoint by the facts now before us. These are that Baxter purchased in 1878 a house and lot on the south side of Indiana Street in the twenty-eighth ward of the City of Philadelphia from one F. C. Paxson. His conveyancer in order to secure for his employer an unincumbered title to

NOTE.—Taxation, landowner cannot be prejudiced by negligent acts of tax officers.

The owner of property assessed for taxes should not be caused to suffer by reason of the acts or omissions of the taxing officers. Baird v. Cahoon, 5 Wats. & S. 540.

So if the owner applies at the proper office for a list of taxes standing against his land on the books of the office, and through mistake of the officer an incomplete list is furnished, which he pays, it will be deemed a full payment so far as to invalidate a sale for the taxes omitted by the officer. Breisch 12 L. R. A.

v. Coxe, 31 Pa. 386; Jiska v. Ringgold Co. 57 Iowa, 680.

But the mistake of the officer in merely saying that there are no back taxes due will not prevent their recovery, he being under no obligation to give such information. Elliott v. District of Columbia, 3 McArthur. 396.

So where it appears that the tax for the land sold had been actually paid, but by some misunderstanding of the receiving officer it was wrongly applied, the sale would be void and would pass no title. Hickman v. Kempner, 35 Ark. 505; Dougherty v. Dickey, 4 Wats. & S. 146; Laird v. Hlester, 24 Pa. 452.

the premises he desired to buy, applied to the register of unpaid taxes and requested him to "certify any taxes registered against the above property in the name of Franklin C. Paxson or that of any other person." On the 15th of May, 1878, he received from the register's office a certificate properly executed setting forth that, "on examining the register of unpaid taxes for the City of Philadelphia for the years 1878 to 1877 inclusive, I find nothing against the above described premises except as per bill of 1877."

The conveyancer upon the receipt of this certificate of no lien except for taxes of 1877 concluded the transaction and the purchase money was paid over. Three years afterwards the City, in 1880, filed a claim against the same premises for the taxes of 1875. A writ of act. fa. was issued on the claim in 1885, which was eight years after the certificate was made and ten years after the taxes are alleged to have accrued. The defendant replied to the writ with the certificate of the register that the City had no lien on the premises for the taxes of 1875 and with the fact that relying on the certificate he had paid over the purchase money. His position was that if the certificate was true the city had no lien even if the taxes were unpaid. If it was untrue, he having been misled by it into paying out the money when it was in his hands, the city was estopped from alleging its untruth against him.

The court below entertaining a different opinion upon the effect of the certificate directed a verdict in favor of the City. The defendant appealed and assigns the ruling of the learned judge in the court below as error. The effect of the certificate is therefore the only question before us. It is well to remember at the outset that taxes upon seated property were originally a personal charge against the owner for which his personal property and his person were liable to seizure, but which were not a lien upon land. Burd v. Ramsay, 9 Serg. & R. 109. In regard to unseated land a different rule prevailed, the land being treated as the debtor, and not the owner. Payment was compelled by the sale of the land without any personal demand on the owner. In order to facilitate their collection the Legislature has from time to time made seated taxes a lien on the lands on which they are assessed by a series of Acts of Assembly applicable to different portions of the State. In Philadelphia they were made a lien under certain limitations as early as 1824 by an Act passed on the third of February in that year. It provided that taxes imposed on real estate in Philadelphia "shall be a lien on the said real estate on which they may hereafter be imposed or assessed" and that such lien should have priority over liens for debts due to individuals by recognizance, mortgage or judgment against the same real estate. The duration of this lien was limited by the Act of 1845 to the first day of July in the year following that for which the tax was imposed unless before that time the tax was registered in a book to be kept by the register of unpaid taxes for that purpose. If it was registered in time then the lien was continued to the end of five years from the time the lien began. If before the expiration of the five years a claim was filed for the tax in the office of the prothonotary, this continued the lien for five years from the entry of the claim. The tax was thus made a lien during the year for which it was levied and until the first day of July following without any formal registry. The lien thereafter was lost unless the tax was entered on the registry of unpaid taxes, and at the end of five years it ceased altogether unless proceeded for by claims filed in the court of common pleas. A purchaser was therefore bound to take notice of the current taxes for six months after the end of the year. He was then bound to take notice of the registry for the balance of five years. After five years he was not bound to inquire beyond the lien dockets. To enable him to know with certainty what the registry showed, the Act of 1845 made it the duty of the register "to furnish certificates of all taxes and claims which are a lien on real estate," and provided a fee to be charged for such service. The certificate held by Baxter was made under the direction of the Act of 1845. Does it protect the purchaser who procures and acts upon it? The court below held that it did not and gave three reasons for entertaining that opinion: 1. The register is an elective officer over whose selection and term of office the city has no control and for whose certificates she is therefore not responsible. 2. The law does not make it his duty to certify to the absence of liens, and when he gives such a certificate he "becomes the special agent of the purchaser" who asks for it. 3. The certificate, by reason of its form, or want of it, imposes no liability even if it was the duty of the register to make certificates of search and no lien.

As authority for the first of these positions, Alcorn v. Philadelphia, 44 Pa. 348, is cited. The plaintiff in that case sought to hold the city for the negligence of the city surveyor in locating the lines of plaintiff's lot at his request. This court held that the act of the city surveyor was in no sense that of the city nor was the duty in which he was engaged a municipal duty. The location of lines between adjoining owners, and surveying lots, was held to be "not a duty incumbent on cities in their corporate capacity . . . but a private one falling on the lotowners themselves." The city surveyor, like county surveyors and other public officers, is elected not to represent the municipality but to serve the public as occasion may require at the instance and upon the employment of individuals. But the collection of taxes is a municipal purpose. They are levied, collected and disbursed under the authority and direction of the city by officers appointed or elected for the purpose who represent the city. When levied the duplicates are charged to the register. He is the only authorized collector and receiving officer. He is required to open his books for the receipt of taxes on the first day of January of the year for which the taxes are assessed. His daily collections must be reported to the city comptroller and his daily cash receipts deposited in the banks designated for that purpose. Taxes not paid during the year or within fifteen days thereafter he is required to enter upon the register of unpaid taxes in order to continue their lien. If this is not done the lien ceases and the real estate may pass by sale discharged therefrom. Smalls v. Donohue, 11 W. N. C. 230. The entries on the register if made in time are valid liens on the real estate affected by them, and must be taken notice of and provided for in case of sale. These liens are not the result of legal proceeding in a court of record which are notice to everybody, but of the act of the City in carrying the unpaid taxes upon the book kept for that purpose in the office of her receiving officer. This is the book of the City, made up by the officials who represent her, and remaining in their custody. It is the evidence of her demands upon real estate within her borders. A purchaser must take notice of this book and to enable him to know with certainty what appears upon it the law makes it the duty of the register of unpaid taxes to certify the liens against any particular piece of real estate. This is a specific duty imposed upon him by law as the representative of the City, the collector of its taxes, and the custodian of its records. In its discharge he represents his principal, speaks for it, and binds it. If his certificate is false and misleading, one who acts upon it in good faith has a right to insist that the City is bound by it. The City is not above the duty to deal fairly and justly with its citizens and to speak the truth to them when the duty to speak for their information rests clearly on it.

The second reason does not seem to us tenable. When taxes were made a lien on the real estate on which they were levied in the City of Philadelphia it was necessary to provide some record of the liens unpaid at the end of the current year. For this purpose a book was provided upon which unpaid taxes were to be entered. Taxes not appearing there were presumed to be paid and they were not liens. Taxes appearing there were valid liens upon the real estate on which they were assessed. This book was thus made the lien docket of the City. It was the proper and the only reliable source of information open to the interested inquirer. It was kept by, and in the custody of, the register, whose duty it was to certify liens appearing upon it. When applied to it was his duty as the representative of the City to state truly the liens against the real estate inquired about. Baxter's conveyancer applied for a search, which made an examination for five years necessary. The register certified that he had examined for five years, viz., 1873 to 1877 inclusive, and that there were no taxes registered against the lot except those of 1877. It was as important to the purchaser to know that there were no taxes registered for 1875 as to know that there were taxes unpaid for 1877. It was the amount of liens the purchaser was interested to know and that the City was bound to tell him, for they were to be taken into consideration and adjusted in the purchase about to be closed. In giving this information he was in no sense the agent of the purchaser. He was discharging an official duty, viz., certifying the liens against the lot inquired about, and he was under a legal obligation to certify their amount truly.

Nor do we regard the form of the certificate as a matter of any consequence in this case. The purchaser applied for and had a right to receive a certificate in proper form informing him of the exact amount of the demands of the City for unpaid taxes. A certificate intended to convey the needed information was furnished, and relying on the truth of its statement the title was taken and the purchase money paid over. Having thus led the purchaser to pay the amount of the taxes of 1875 to his vendor as purchase money, the City cannot now be permitted to set up the mistake of its officer as a reason for compelling the payment of the money a second time. If it was a mistake, as it was acted upon in good faith by the purchaser, the City cannot now assert a lien for the taxes of 1875 nor deny the facts which the certificate asserted.

The subject of the want of form in a certificate and of negative statements therein was considered in Ziegler v. Com., 12 Pa. 227, in which a certificate similar to the one before us was held sufficient in form to justify a recovery.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, MIDDLE DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
v.
JELICO MOUNTAIN COKE & COAL
CO. et al.

(46 Fed. Rep. 432.)

1. Circuit courts of the United States may constitutionally be given juris-

isdiction of suits by the government to enjoin illegal combinations in restraint of interstate commerce, and it does not depend on diverse citizenship of the parties.

2. Authorizing an injunction by a federal court against illegal combinations in restraint of interstate commerce, although they are made misdemeanors, does not violate the provisions of the Constitution of the United States requiring the trial of crimes to be by jury.

NOTE.—Monopolies as public nuisances; may be restrained.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to restrain a public nuisance by injunction at suit of the State, or the people, or the municipality; and Acts of a State Legislature granting a corporate franchise 12 L. R. A.

repugnant to that clause of the Federal Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce cannot be sustained. Gibbons v. Ogden, 23 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; North River S. B. Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow. 718.

Every contract, combination in the form of trust

3. A combination between coal producers in one State and coal dealers in another, to regulate prices of coal in a certain city and to divide any advances in price in excess of the advances in freights, and tending to monopolize the coal trade of the city among members of the combination, is in violation of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, prohibiting conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce.

SUIT in equity to enjoin defendants from unlawfully combining to restrain interstate trade and commerce in coal at Nashville contrary to the provisions of a United States statute. Relief granted.

On September 25, 1890, a petition for injunction was filed setting forth as follows:

That the defendants, a number of whom are Kentucky mining companies, and another number are coal dealers in Nashville, Tennessee, secretly entered into an illegal contract and combination in the form of a trust, and entered into a conspiracy with one another, and engaged at Nashville in a combination and conspiracy which restrained the trade and commerce in coal at Nashville between the States of Kentucky, Alabama and Tennessee.

That the defendants combining and confederating, by articles of agreement more particularly set forth in the decision (see decision), under the name of the "Nashville Coal Exchange" monopolized the trade in coal which is produced in Kentucky and shipped from thence to Nashville, Tennessee, contrary to the provisions of an Act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"Sec. 1. Every contract combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 3. Every contract combination, in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

"Sec. 4. The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this Act; and it shall be the duty of the several or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is declared by statute illegal, and the persons combining are guilty of a misdemeanor (see 26 U. S. Rev. Stat. 200); and the circuit court has jurisdiction to make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises. Id. § 4.

Remedy by injunction.

The fact that keeping a nuisance is a crime does not deprive a court of equity of the power to abate the nuisance. Carleton v. Rugg, 5 L. R. A. 198, 149 Mass. 550; Atty-Gen. v. Hunter, 1 Dev. Eq. 12; People v. St. Louis, 10 Ill. 261; Bwell v. Greenwood, 26 Iowa, 377; Minke v. Hopeman, 87 Ill. 450, 29 Am. Rep. 63.

A proceeding to abate a nuisance looks only to the property, that the use made of it constitutes the nuisance, while the proceeding to punish the offender is for the crime of maintaining the nuisance. Carleton v. Rugg, supra.

Hence a statute which gives jurisdiction in equity to abate a common nuisance, which is also declared to be a crime, is not unconstitutional as depriving a party of the right of trial by jury. See, in illustration, Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1; The License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 255; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 120, 21 L. ed. 929; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 909; 13 L. R. A.

The proper proceeding in equity to restrain a public nuisance is by information by the attorney-general. Newark Aqueduct Board v. Passaic, 45 N. J. Eq. 393; Georgetown v. Alexandria Canal Co. 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 98, 9 L. ed. 1015.

Contracts in derogation of public rights, such as monopolies, are unlawful. See notes to Leslie v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 1 L. R. A. 453.

Such contracts are void. See notes to People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 33; Carroll v. Giles (S. C.) 4 L. R. A. 154.

Monopolies are contrary to public policy, and contracts creating them are not enforceable. See notes to Richardson v. Buhl (Mich.) 6 L. R. A. 457; Pittsburgh Carbon Co. v. McMillin, 7 L. R. A. 44, 119 N. Y. 46.

district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the attorney-general, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

"Sec. 5. Whenever it shall appear to the court before which any proceeding under section 4 of this Act may be pending, that the ends of justice require that other parties should be brought before the court, the court may cause them to be summoned, whether they reside in the district in which the court is held or not; and subpoenas to that end may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

"Sec. 6. Any property owned under any contract or by any combination, or pursuant to any conspiracy (and being the subject thereof) mentioned in section 1 of this Act, and being in the course of transportation from one State to another, or to a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.

"Sec. 7. Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful by this Act, may sue therefor in any circuit court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the costs of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

"Sec. 8. That the word 'person' or 'persons,' wherever used in this Act, shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country."

The prayer of the petition is that the defendants be enjoined or otherwise prohibited from violating the provisions of the said Act of Congress, and that they be enjoined and restrained from further monopolizing and carrying on the coal trade in Nashville under the combination and confederation as aforesaid.

Mr. John Ruhm, U. S. Atty., for complainant:

The power of Congress to enact the Statute which is the basis of this law-suit is derived from U. S. Const., art. 1, § 8, subsec. 8, 18, giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the States. This power is unlimited and paramount; it is co-extensive with the entire field of commerce.

Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 28 L. ed. 347; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 16. L. ed. 23; United States v. Marigold, 50 U. S. 12 L. R. A.

9 How. 560, 13 L. ed. 257; Hare, Am. Const. Law, 438.

Interstate commerce consists of traffic and transportation between the States; and Congress may regulate the traffic, or the transportation, or both.

The power to regulate is unlimited, so long as it is confined to interstate commerce.

At common law contracts are held void:

1. Where their effect is in general restraint of trade.

2. Where the restraint is partial only, either as to time or place, but where it is unreasonable, or where it injuriously affects the public, or where there is no consideration to support it.

3. Where there is a combination to stifle competition, or to control the prices of the necessities of life.

4. What is an unreasonable restraint and whether or not the contract is injurious to the public is always a question of law for the court to be determined from the face of the contract.

1. Wharton, Cont. § 433; Bishop, Cont. § 517; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 934.

5. Courts will not inquire whether or not the agreement entered into has in fact caused an injury to the public or has caused an unreasonable restraint. The inquiry merely is, whether the agreement has a tendency to produce the effect.

Co.* 2 L. R. A. 38, and note, 22 Abb. N. C. 164.

The present Statute adopts these principles of the common law so far as they relate to interstate commerce, but goes one step further and removes the difficulty of investigating whether the restraint is partial or general—it applies the regulation ex vi terminis to “any part of interstate trade.”

Mr. James Trimble, Special Asst. to U. S. Atty., made the following additional points for complainant:

As courts of equity, the United States circuit courts, by their inherent jurisdiction, regardless of the Act of July 2, 1890, have jurisdiction of the subject matter to grant the relief prayed.

Key, J., delivered the following opinion:

The petition in this case is filed against the members of the Nashville Coal Exchange. The membership of the exchange is composed of various coal-mining companies operating mines in Kentucky and Tennessee, chiefly in Kentucky, and of persons and firms dealing in coal at Nashville, Tenn. It is alleged that the purposes, objects and agreement of the defendants are in violation of an Act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled, "An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies," and the petition seeks to restrain and prevent the violations of the Act by injunction under section 4 of the Law. The first section of the Act declares that "every contract or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, is declared illegal." The second section declares that, "every person who shall monopolize or combine or conspire with another person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." A violation of the first section is a misdemeanor also. By the fourth section jurisdiction is conferred upon the circuit courts of the United States to prevent and restrain violations of the Act, and it is made the duty of district attorneys in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. The articles of agreement between the defendants provide, amongst other things, that the objects of this exchange are, "to do all in its power to advance the interests of the coal business at Nashville, to treat all parties to this agreement in a fair and equitable manner, and to establish prices on coal at Nashville, Tenn., and to change same from time to time, as occasion may require." Prices to consumers at Nashville are to be established so as to sell coal at a fair and reasonable price so as to allow all parties a fair profit for their product. Every person, firm or corporation owning or operating mines who ship coal to Nashville shall be eligible to membership in this exchange, and all coal dealers in the City of Nashville are also eligible to membership. None others are eligible. Any member of the exchange who may withdraw from it and continue in the coal trade in Nashville or ship any coal to Nashville shall forfeit and relinquish all interest of any and every kind, however obtained or accrued. The exchange will from time to time establish prices at which coal shall be sold in Nashville. Coal classed as No. 1 shall be valued at the mines at 4½ cents minimum price of eighty pounds lump, and freight being 4 cents, and the dealer's margin to be 4½ cents, making the price of lump coal 18 cents per bushel. No. 2 to be valued at 5 cents at the mine. No. 3 at 6 cents, and when the above prices are advanced in excess of the advance in freights, then one half the advance shall go to the mine owners and one half to the dealers. Every member found guilty of selling coal at a less price than the price fixed by the exchange, either directly or indirectly, shall be fined 3 cents per bushel and $10 for the first offense, and 4 cents per bushel and $20 for the second offense. A majority of all the members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

Owners or operators of mines shall not sell or ship coal to any person, firm or corporation in Nashville, or West Nashville, or East Nashville, who are not members of the exchange, and dealers shall not buy coal from anyone not a member of the exchange. All coal used for manufacturing and steamboat purposes shall be exempt from prices made by the exchange until all mines tributary to this market shall become members of the exchange, or until the exchange can control prices to govern coal used by manufacturers. No coal shall be sold in any month to be delivered in any following month except at prices fixed for the particular month in which coal so sold is to be delivered. Fines and penalties are declared so as to enforce the stipulations embodied in the Constitution and by-laws of the exchange.

It can hardly be denied that such provisions as these, by a body of persons such as compose this exchange, is not a contract or combination in restraint of trade or commerce, or an attempt between different persons to monopolize a part of the trade or commerce between parties who are citizens of or reside in different States. It is shown that several mining companies in Kentucky engaged in raising coal, and most of the coal dealers of Nashville, Tenn., have entered into the foregoing mentioned arrangement. It is insisted for the defendants that the subject of agreement is not interstate commerce; that the obligation as to the mining companies ends at the mines. The price is fixed and paid at that point, and consequently controversies in regard to the contract as to them belong exclusively to the courts of the State of Kentucky; that so far as the dealers are concerned the price of the coal is fixed for its sale at Nashville, and after it becomes their property by delivery to them, and therefore the courts of Tennessee have the jurisdiction as to them. Various authorities are cited, and the debates in the Senate of the United States are read to sustain this view of the case. As I understand the contention of defendant's counsel it is that the agreement is not violative of the terms of the Act of July 2, 1890. But if it is the Act is unconstitutional; first, because the Constitution confers upon the courts of the United States in such a case jurisdiction over "controversies between citizens of different States." That the fact that parties to a contract are citizens of different States does not confer jurisdiction. There must be a controversy between the parties to the contract, and this litigation is not a dispute between the contracting parties, but between the government and these parties. Second, that the Act creates and defines criminal offenses, and the Constitution provides that the "trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury, and that section 4 of the Act, so far as it attempts to give circuit courts of the United States equitable jurisdiction over the violations of the Act, is unconstitutional. It is insisted the proceeding authorized is in substance an information in equity charging defendants with a misdemeanor.

I shall not enter into a discussion of the constitutionality of the law. A court, especially an inferior one, should hesitate long and consider carefully before it should declare an Act of Congress, passed after deliberation and debate and approved by the president, unconstitutional. The reasons for such a decision in such a case should be clear and undeniable. If doubtful or questionable the doubt should be resolved in favor of the law.

The arguments against the validity of the Act have been urged with great plausibility and strength, and an army of authorities have been read as sustaining the views of defendant's counsel. The positions of defendant's counsel have been met with equal force and ability by those representing the government, and many authorities have been referred to in support of the power of Congress to pass the law; and without nicely adjusting and weighing the opposing views of counsel, enough appears to prevent me from declaring the Act, or any part of it, as outside of the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution.

The remaining question is whether the agreement and regulations between the defendants are a "contract or combination in restraint of trade or commerce between States;" are they evidence of a combination to monopolize "any part of the trade or commerce" between the States of Tennessee and Kentucky. The coal mines are in Kentucky, and the coal is to be mined there for a certain price, and the agreement contemplates its shipment to Nashville. To be sure it is not to be transported thither by the defendants or any of them, but the price for which it is to be shipped is fixed or stated, and becomes a part of the price for which the coal is to be sold at Nashville; and when the prices fixed "are advanced in excess of the advance in freights, the one half of the advance shall go to the mine owners and one half to the dealers." In making the agreement the transportation of the coal from Kentucky to Nashville was a necessary incident to and element in the arrangement, and its execution would have been impossible without it. The instrumentality of transportation did not belong to, nor was it controlled by, them, but it was used by them and paid by them for services rendered. The contract provided for the sale of coal in Kentucky, its shipment to Nashville, Tenn., to dealers there, for its retail to consumers. It was to all intents and purposes a traffic trade, commerce between States.

Was the purpose of the exchange to monopolize a part of this trade, or to combine in restraint thereof? The exchange does not propose to be governed and controlled by the public markets arising from competition and the operations of the laws of supply and demand. On the contrary, it announces that its purpose is "to establish prices on coal at Nashville, Tenn., and to change the same from time to time as occasion may require," and in carrying out this object it asserts that "the exchange will establish prices at which coal shall be sold in Nashville, subject, however, to the following conditions and basis: Coal classed as No. 1 to be valued at the mines at 4 cents minimum price per bushel of eighty-five pounds for lump, and freight being 4 cents, the dealer's margin to be 4½ cents, making the price of lump coal 13 cents per bushel; No. 2 to be valued at 5 cents at the mines; No. 8, 6 cents; and when the above prices are advanced in excess of the advance in freights, the one half of the advance shall go to the mine owners and one half to the dealers." "Any member found guilty of selling coal at a less price than the price fixed by the exchange, either directly or indirectly, shall be fined 2 cents per bushel and $10 for the first offense, and 4 cents a bushel and $20 for the second offense." These provisions, so far as this combination could do so, fixed the lowest price of coal to consumers in and near Nashville at 18 cents per bushel and prevented coal being sold there at a cheaper rate, no matter how much less it might cost in an open and unobstructed market. Nor is this all. The exchange ordains that "owners or operators of mines shall not sell or ship coal to any firm, person or corporation in Nashville or West Nashville or East Nashville who are not members of this exchange, and dealers shall not buy coal from anyone who is not a member of the exchange." The coal trade is confined to dealings, so far as the market supply is concerned, to transactions between the miner and dealer; the prices are fixed by them and the miner and dealer only are eligible to membership. The miners of the concern cannot sell to any dealer in or near Nashville who is not a party to the agreement, nor can such dealer purchase coal of any miner anywhere who is not a member of the body. The operations of both are confined within the membership. So far as Nashville is concerned, they cannot go to cheaper or more favorable markets, or deal with those who would give more favorable terms. The restraint is positive and undeniable. Moreover, in the first section of the by-laws of the exchange it is asserted that "all coal used for manufacturing and steamboat purposes shall be exempt from prices made by this exchange until all mines tributary to this market shall become members of the exchange, or until the exchange can control prices to govern coal used by manufacturers." This clearly indicates the purpose of the association to be to control the price of coal in the Nashville market used in manufacturing and in steamboats whenever it could; that the mines of coal tributary to Nashville were all expected to become members of the exchange, whereupon the prices of coal could be fixed absolutely, and the necessary inference from this declaration and the entire organic structure of the body is that it felt strong enough already to regulate and establish the prices of domestic coal in that market, to a large extent at least, and that this exchange might now monopolize the business of dealing in domestic coal in the Nashville market, and in the future monopolize by and confine to its membership the entire trade in coal at that point. It seems to me that the purpose and intentions of the association could hardly have been more successfully framed to fall within the provisions of the Act of July 2, 1890, had the object been to organize a combination, the business of which should subject it to the penalties of that Statute, and that there is no need of authorities to sustain such view of the case. Regarding the Act as constitutional, I see no way for the defendants to escape its condemnation.

Proof has been taken, on one hand, to establish that the people of Nashville have been and are being injured by the high prices which have been and are being paid for coal, and the extent of the injury. On the other hand, defendants have introduced proof to show that the higher freight rates to Nashville and the want of facilities for transportation by railroad and water are the causes for the higher prices of coal at Nashville than at Louisville or Memphis, but it is needless to enter upon this branch of dispute. "The attempt to monopolize or combine" is denounced by the second section of the Act, and the first section, "every contract or combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." The attempt, the contract to do the thing prohibited, is enough to incur the penalties of this law.

I conclude that the defendants, by the organization of the Nashville Coal Exchange, and their operations under it, have been, and at the time of filing the petition in this cause were, guilty of a violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Act of July 2, 1890, and should be enjoined from further violations of the law, as provided by the fourth section thereof.

The petition will be dismissed as to such of the defendants as are not, or were not members of the exchange at the time of the filing of the petition.

"The finding of an examining magistrate that 'an offense has been committed and that there was probable cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof,' is only prima facie evidence of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution brought by such defendant against the prosecuting witness.

The facts appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Hulett & Fletcher, with Messrs. Cory & Hulbert, for plaintiff in error:

That the examining magistrate had made a finding of probable cause, and had committed the accused for appearance at the district court, was mere conclusive evidence of probable cause.

A defendant in an action of malicious prosecution may be protected by reasonable and probable cause, although he was mistaken honestly upon a matter of fact, and not upon a matter of law. Rex v. Stewart, 6 Manitoba L. Rep. 257.

The judgment of a justice's court convicting a defendant of a criminal charge, though appealed from and an acquittal had in the circuit court, is, in the absence of fraud, perjury or any improper motive, conclusive of probable cause. Adams v. Bloknell, 128 Ind. 210.

Meers, Hill & Chenault for defendant in error.

Simpson, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 17th day of January, 1887, Hixon filed an affidavit before a justice of the peace in Bourbon County, charging Ross with having mixed certain poison with a quantity of flour, with the intent and for the purpose of causing the death of certain persons. Upon said complaint a warrant was issued, and Ross was arrested. A preliminary trial was had on the 4th of February before the justice who issued the warrant. At the preliminary examination twelve witnesses were examined for the State, and seven for the defendant. After the hearing of all the evidence, the justice bound Ross to appear at the district court and answer the charge. He failed to give bond, and was committed to jail. The finding of the justice was as follows: "After hearing the evidence, I find that said offense has been committed, and that there is probable cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof." Ross was in jail from the 17th day of January, 1887, until May 2, 1887. On the latter date, the District Court of Bourbon County being in session, the county attorney filed a statement showing cause for non-prosecution, and Ross was discharged. On the 8th day of August, 1887, he commenced this action for malicious prosecution against James Hixon, the prosecuting witness. Trial was had at the May Term, 1888. The plaintiff in error offered evidence showing the proceedings before the justice of the peace on the criminal charge, and tending to prove every material allegation in such an action. When the plaintiff rested, the defendant Hixon introduced a large number of witnesses, when he was interrupted by the court. The trial was stopped, and a verdict was ordered for the defendant. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and a motion for a new trial was overruled. The record itself discloses no reason for the ruling of the court, but counsel agreed that the reason assigned by the trial court was that the examining magistrate had made a finding of probable cause, and that such finding was conclusive upon that question. It is further claimed by counsel for the defendant in error that the trial court made the further statement: "That, as the petition does not charge fraud or undue means in obtaining the finding of probable cause by the magistrate, the same cannot be attacked." The sole question discussed in the oral argument of counsel for defendant in error, and the briefs on both sides, is as to the weight to be given to the finding of the examining magistrate as to whether it is prima facie or conclusive on the question of probable cause, and whether or not, in either case, the finding must be attacked for fraud or undue means by proper allegations in the petition.

1. In the case of Sweeney v. Pernoy, 40 Kan. 102, this court incidentally noticed the conflict in authorities as to whether or not proof of arrest, committal and indictment is prima facie proof of probable cause; and the case of Ricord v. Central Pac. R. Co., 15 Nev. 167, was cited on one side, and that of Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192, on the other. The question in this case is closely allied to this controversy, but authorities cannot be found on both sides of this question. In the case of Bauer v. Clay, 8 Kan. 585, Justice Valentine says: "The proof showing that the justice ordered that Clay should be bound over for his appearance at court, or, in default of bail, that he should be committed to the county jail, is only prima facie, and not conclusive, evidence of probable cause." The cases of Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119, and Ewing v. Sanford, 19 Ala. 605, are cited in support. The force of this decision is sought to be destroyed by counsel for defendant in error by an assertion that it is dictum. It is sometimes difficult to draw the line between what is authoritative and what is not in a judicial opinion. The report of the case does not give either the pleadings, the assignment of errors or the briefs, but it is evident that the question was necessarily involved in the rulings of the trial court; and this court thought it necessary to give this as one of the reasons for affirmance of the judgment below, because, if counsel for defendant in error are now right in their contention, Clay had no cause of action, and the case was decided wrongfully in both the trial and the appellate courts. However the rule may be in cases in which the magistrates have jurisdiction to hear and pass judgment, we are satisfied that the case of Bauer v. Clay states the true rule in cases in which the magistrates have only power to bind over. This rule is upheld by the cases of Ash v. Marlow, 20 Ohio, 119; Ewing v. Sanford, 19 Ala. 605; Raleigh v. Cook, 60 Tex. 438; Ricord v. Central Pac. R. Co. 15 Nev. 167; Hale v. Boylen, 23 W. Va. 284; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217; Spalding v. Lowe, 56 Mich. 366; Ganea v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 140; Diemer v. Herber, 75 Cal. 287.

These are all express adjudications on that particular question. In one of these cases, decided in 1885, being that of Spalding v. Lowe, 56 Mich. 366, the defendant requested the trial court to instruct the jury as follows: "It appears from the proofs in this case that an examination was had upon the charge made against Spalding, and that the justice upon such examination determined that this offense charged against Spalding had been committed, and that there was probable cause to believe said Spalding guilty thereof. This was a judicial determination the justice was authorized to make, and unless such action and determination of the justice was corrupt or collusive, or was wrongfully procured by the defendant herein, it is final as to the question of probable cause, and your verdict should be for the defendant." The trial court refused to so instruct the jury, and this refusal was assigned as error in the supreme court, but that court says (p. 372, 56 Mich.): "No authority has been produced in support of it, and we think none exists."

We have been unable to find a reported case in which the rule is held as claimed by counsel for defendant in error. There are cases that so hold when the magistrate has power to render a judgment of conviction. How much weight as proof of probable cause shall be attributed to the judgment of a court in an original action, when subsequently reversed for error, is elaborately discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 120 U.S. 141, 80 L.ed. 614,—a case much relied on by counsel for defendant in error. To our mind, however, the distinction between that case and the one at bar is plain and distinct. If the magistrate in Bourbon County had possessed the statutory power to hear the evidence and determine the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and to punish by fine or imprisonment if guilt was found, then his finding and judgment would come within the rules established by that case to be the law of the land. The question in this case is how much weight, as proof of probable cause, shall be attributed to the finding of an examining magistrate that "an offense had been committed, and that there is probable cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof," when the defendant is subsequently discharged, the prosecution against him confessedly ended, and he has instituted a suit for malicious prosecution against the complaining witness. In the one case there is a solemn judgment rendered by a court having full and complete jurisdiction both of the parties and subject matter, binding on all until reversed on appeal or error. In the other case there is a finding, in effect, that sufficient facts have been developed that justify a magistrate in sending the parties before a court competent to ultimately deal with the question of guilt or innocence. Again, while a conviction is generally conclusive of probable cause, yet it may be overcome by a showing that it was procured by fraud, undue means or the false testimony of the prosecution. Womack v. Circle, 20 Gratt. 192; Olson v. Neal, 68 Iowa, 214; Cloon v. Gerry, 18 Gray, 201; Whitney v. Peckham, 15 Mass. 248; Peck v. Chouteau, 91 Mo. 138, 8 West. Rep. 818; Bowman v. Brown, 62 Iowa, 487; Palmer v. Avery, 41 Barb. 290; Bichey v. McBean, 17 Ill. 63; Payson v. Caswell, 22 Me. 212; Herman v. Brookerhoff, 8 Watts, 240; Jones v. Kirksey, 10 Ala. 889.

In such a case the petition in the action for malicious prosecution must directly attack the judgment of conviction, or it will be suicidal. It is therefore unimportant whether the words used by the court in Bauer v. Clay are dicta or authoritative in that case, as they express the law as universally held by all courts of last resort that have spoken on this subject. It follows that the other suggestion of counsel, that the finding of the magistrate must be directly attacked in the petition for fraud or undue means, is without force, because, as that finding is only prima facie, all that is necessary for the plaintiff to do to win is to overthrow it by a preponderance of evidence. It can be fairly said that there was evidence submitted at the trial by the plaintiff in error, other than the transcript of the proceedings before the examining magistrate, bearing upon the question of probable cause; which the court below permitted to go to the jury, from which they might have found that the prima facie case made by the magistrate's finding was overcome. It is recommended that the judgment of the District Court of Bourbon County be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial.

UNION TRUST CO. of New York, Appl.,
v.

Michael COLEMAN et al., Comrs. of Taxes and Assessments, Respts.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. The "capital stock" of a corporation liable to taxation under Laws 1857, chap.

NOTE.—Taxation of corporate stock.

The words "capital stock," in legal contemplation, mean all the property belonging to a corporation, tangible or intangible, of whatever species, which must be valued for the purposes of taxation. Pacific Hotel Co. v. Lieb, 83 Ill. 602; Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 70 Ill. 561.

It means not only stock subscription, but the actual tangible property of the corporation. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Porter, 17 Ind. 380; Whitesell v. Northampton County, 49 Pa. 528; State v. Hamilton, 5 Ind. 310; Floyd County Auditor v. New Albany & S. R. Co. 11 Ind. 570; McKane v. State, Id. 195; State v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484.

456, § 3, is the actual capital owned by the corporation and not the share value of the stock.

2. Assessors have no discretion to take the value of the shares of stock of a corporation as that of its capital stock where they know the value of the latter.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham for appellant.

Messrs. David J. Dean and George S. Coleman, with Mr. William H. Clark, for respondents.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator has been assessed upon an "actual value" of its capital stock derived entirely from the market value of its shares. These are selling at the large premium of something over $500 for each share of $100, and the assessors have concededly taken that valuation, or the principal part thereof, as the "actual value" of the Company's stock liable to taxation, instead of its own proved and established value. The relator challenges the assessment, and through all the proceedings has persistently raised and pressed the inquiry, not so much as to the mode or manner of ascertaining value, but, rather, as to what is the precise thing to be valued,—whether the capital stock of the Company, or the capital stock held in shares by the corporators. If these are the same, or, in any just sense, equivalents, either might be valued without substantial error; but, if they are not such, we must determine which is to be valued before we can solve the problem of how to value it. Now, it is certain that the two things are neither identical nor equivalents. The capital stock of a company is one thing; that of the shareholders is another and a different thing. That of the company is simply its capital, existing in money or property or both; while that of the shareholders is representative, not merely of that existing and tangible capital, but also of surplus, of dividend-earning power, of franchise, and the good-will of an established and prosperous business. The capital stock of the Company is owned and held by the Company in its corporate character; the capital stock of the shareholders they own and hold in different proportions as individuals. The one belongs to the corporation; the other, to the corporators. The franchise of the Company, which may be deemed its business opportunity and capacity, is the property of the corporation, but constitutes no part or element of its capital stock; while the same franchise does enter into and form part, and a very essential part, of the shareholder's capital stock. While the nominal or par value of the capital stock and of the share stock are the same, the actual value is often widely different. The capital stock of the Company may be wholly in cash or in property, or both, which may be counted and valued. It may have in addition a surplus, consisting of some accumulated and reserved fund, or of undivided profits, or both; but that surplus is no part of the Company's capital stock, and therefore is not itself capital stock. The capital cannot be divided and distributed; the surplus may be. But that surplus does enter into and form part of the share stock, for that represents and absorbs into its own value in to effectuate the purposes of the organization, and retains its characteristic of capital stock, even after it has been converted into property necessary to the prosecution of its business. Bank Tax Case, 40 U. S. 2 Wall. 208, 17 L. ed. 736; Farrington v. Tennessee, 35 U. S. 698, 34 L. ed. 560; Jones v. Davis, 35 Ohio St. 477.

Value, how ascertained.

This paid-up capital stock is liable to assessment and taxation like any other personal property. Its value is to be ascertained either from its quoted market price or in any other legitimate manner. New Orleans City Gas Light Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. Ann. 475.

But the market value of shares of stock in a corporation is not the proper and sole test of the value of corporate stock. Albany City Nat. Bank v. Maher, 19 Blatchf. 175, 178; Van Allen v. The Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573-584, 18 L. ed. 229-234.

So the market value of the shares of capital stock may sometimes be above and sometimes below the actual value. Such value may be greatly enhanced or depressed for speculative purposes without any change in the actual value. People v. Coleman, 10 Cent. Rep. 266, 107 N. Y. 541.

But there is no law which compels assessors to resort to market value to find the actual value of capital stock. That standard is sometimes illusory and untrustworthy. The buyers or sellers may be too few and the transactions not sufficiently numerous to furnish a real test of value. Ibid.

Distinction between capital and shares of stock.

In Deady on Taxation, § 74, this distinction is clearly indicated. He says: "Capital and capital stock are in legal intent synonymous, and are used in legislative Acts as equivalent terms, though strictly not of the same meaning" (New Orleans 12 L. R. A.

City Gas Light Co. v. Board of Assessors, 31 La. Ann. 477). Capital stock means not shares of stock, either separately or in the aggregate, but is intended to designate the property of the corporation subject to taxation, not in separate parcels, but as a homogeneous unit, partaking of the nature of personality, and subject to the burdens imposed on it, at the domicile of the owner where it exercises its corporate functions, and where its business is done (Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Siders, 88 Ill. 324; Quincy Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 621; Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 661). They are distinct properties, although the shares of stock have no value save that which they derive from the corporate property and franchise; and a tax levied upon the property of the one is not, in any legal sense, levied upon the property of another." Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. supra; Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 83 N. C. 415.

3 Redfield on Railways, 3d ed., p. 453, says: "We find the clear recognition of three kinds of corporate property taxable to the corporation, and the shares in the hands of corporators distinctly defined as a fourth species of corporate property, which is taxable only to the owners or holders; (1) the capital stock; (2) the corporate property; (3) the franchise of the corporation; all of which is taxable to the corporation; and the shares in the capital stock, which is taxable only to the shareholders." The owner of stock, who has hypotheicated or pledged the same, is the proper party to be assessed on such stock. Tucker v. Aiken, 7 N. H. 118.

It follows in strict analogy that the pledgee of stock is liable to tax levied on the shares held by him. Waltham Bank v. Waltham, 10 Met. 384.

It should be borne in mind that capital and shares of stock are distinct property, and that the statutory exemption of one is not to be construed as ex-surplus as well as capital, and the franchise in addition, so that the property of every company may consist of three separate and distinct things, which are its capital stock, its surplus and its franchise; but these three things, several in the ownership of the company, are united in the ownership of the shareholders. The share stock covers, embraces, represents all three in their totality; for it is a business photograph of all the corporate possessions and possibilities. A company also may have no surplus, but, on the contrary, a deficiency which works an impairment of its capital stock. Its actual value is then less than its nominal or par value, while yet the share stock, strengthened by hope of the future and the support of earnings, may be worth its par, or even more. And thus the two things, the company's capital stock and the shareholder's capital stock, are essentially and in every material respect different. They differ in their character, in their elements, in their ownership and in their values. How important and vital the difference is, became evident in the effort by the state authorities to tax the property of the national banks. The effort failed, and yet the share stock in the ownership of individuals was held to be taxable as against them. The corporation and its property were shielded, but the shareholders and their property were taxed.

Now, some degree of confusion and trouble have come in because these two different things are denominated alike "capital stock," making the expression sometimes ambiguous. It is the important and decisive phrase in the Law of 1857 under which the as-essment here resisted was made, and requires of us to determine at the outset in which sense it was used. The section reads thus: "The capital stock of every company liable to taxation, except such part of it as shall have been excepted in the assessment roll, or shall have been exempted by law, together with its surplus profits or reserved funds exceeding 10 per cent of its capital, after deducting the assessed value of its real estate, and all shares of stock in other corporations actually owned by such company which are taxable upon their capital stock under the laws of this State, shall be assessed at its actual value, and taxed in the same manner as the other real and personal estate of the county." There are reasons in abundance for the conclusion that by the phrase "capital stock" the statute means not the share stock, but the capital owned by the corporation; the fund required to be paid in and kept intact as the basis of the business enterprise, and the chief factor of its safety. One ample reason is derived from the fact that the tax is assessed against the corporation, and upon its property; and not against the shareholders, and so upon their property. In theory, every tax is charged against some person, natural or artificial, resident or nonresident, known or unknown. It is assessed, not upon property irrespective of ownership, but against persons in respect to their property (New York v. New York Tax Commr. 23 N. Y. 215); and effects, not merely a lien, but also a personal liability. On the assessment rolls in this case appeared the name of the relator as the person assessed, and the empting the other; and so the levy of a tax on one is not the imposition of a similar tax on the other. People v. New York Tax Commr. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 259, 18 L. ed. 350; Van Allen v. The Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573, 18 L. ed. 239; Memphis v. Farrington, 8 Baxt. 539.

Mr. Waterman says, in his valuable treatise on Taxation (§ 259): "Exemption from taxation is not favored by the courts, and it is, in general, strictly construed; and it has been held in Maryland that the Legislature cannot grant to a corporation an immunity from taxation or any other corporate privilege beyond the power of a subsequent Legislature to repeal or revoke." State v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 44 Md. 181.

It may be affirmed that the taxation of corporate stock to meet and defray the ordinary expenses incident to good government is a principle of very extensive application, and one that has been enforced by all courts from a very early period.

"The taxing power is of vital importance," said Chief Justice Marshall in Providence Bank v. Billings, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 561, 7 L. ed. 955; "its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the State to abandon it does not appear."

Duty of assessors.

It is not a controlling fact in the assessment of the capital stock of a corporation that the whole capital was originally invested in real estate; it is the duty of the assessors to ascertain the present value of the stock, and from this to deduct the assessed value of the real estate. While the indebtedness of the corporation is a proper subject for consideration in estimating the value of stock, there is no authority for its deduction from the value after an estimate of the same has been made. People v. Astin, 1 Cent. Rep. 770, 100 N. Y. 597. 12 L. R. A.

If the stock of the corporation be assessed at its actual value, it would seem necessarily to follow that all the property of the corporation "capable of private ownership" was included in the valuation (Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 599); but where the assessment of the franchise of a corporation is specially provided for, either by statute or as part of the organic law, and it is also provided that "stock" and "everything capable of private ownership" shall be taxed, it is within the province of the Legislature to provide the rule for taxing the property of corporations by excluding "stocks," or the shares of capital stock, and including the property and the franchise only. San José Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 601; Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 63 Cal. 114; Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 591.

Power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty employed to secure a revenue for its maintenance. Its exercise belongs to the States independent of the United States government, affected only by those laws which Congress may enact with respect to the property of the United States, and the revenues thereof (McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579; Lane County v. Oregon, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 77, 19 L. ed. 104; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 29, 21 L. ed. 788); and it attaches alike upon everything within the jurisdiction of the State, not the property of the United States nor means employed for the performance of the functions of the United States. People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 47.

The power is supreme, in the absence of constitutional restrictions. McCulloch v. Maryland, supra; McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11; Beals v. Amador County, 35 Cal. 624; People v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 175; Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 240; Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, 41 Cal. 148; San José v. San José & St.

amount of the tax became a charge against it. Of course, it could only be assessed and taxed in respect to its own property,—that which in its corporate character it owned and possessed; and so it follows inevitably that the Statute concerns the company's capital stock,—that is, its real and actual capital,—and not in any respect the share stock which it does not own, and whose possessors have not been assessed.

Another reason is found in those terms of the Statute which include and exclude, respectively, specific kinds or classes of property in the corporate ownership. Thus, the assessment is to be laid, not merely upon the capital stock of the corporation, but also upon its surplus. No such explicit direction was necessary, except on the assumption that by the words "capital stock" was meant simply "capital" which would not include surplus, and so required that it be subjected by name to the valuation. If the share stock was meant, its value would include surplus, and make its specification not only needless, but confusing. But while the Statute includes surplus by specific mention, it excludes franchise by omitting it. The omission of franchise is emphasized by the careful inclusion of surplus. It is fully and definitely settled that the tax imposed by the Statute is not upon franchise. New York v. New York Tax Comrs. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 620, 17 L. ed. 451. But, if that be so, it is not upon the share stock, for that represents the value of the corporate franchise as a part of the total of the corporate property; and so, both by what it specifically includes and silently excludes, the Statute itself informs us that by "capital stock" it means and intends the company's actual capital paid in and possessed, and not at all or in any sense the share stock. The same thing becomes apparent from a study of the whole line of legislation which culminated in the Law of 1857. It was traced in detail upon the argument with great industry and wealth of illustration. We have verified it by traveling over the same track, and without taking pains to reproduce it, may assert the general result which it discloses, and select out one or more illustrations. The investigation shows that the word "capital" and the phrase "capital stock" are used interchangeably and synonymously, and, where, the latter phrase occurs, there is almost always something in the Statute which stamps and labels it as referring to the actual capital of the company. Thus the Law of 1823 (chap. 262), after providing for the taxation of all persons owning or possessing property, proceeds to declare that corporations shall be deemed persons for the purposes of the Act, and requires them to furnish a statement of the amount of "capital" actually paid in; and then, referring to turnpike and bridge companies, requires them to state "the amount of capital stock actually paid in or secured to be paid in." Both clauses refer to the same assets or fund, naming it indiscriminately "capital" and "capital stock." Again, in the Law of 1825 (chap. 254), the assessors, after putting the corporation by name on the assessment roll, are required to add the amount "of its capital stock paid in or secured to be paid in," and to designate how much of it is in real and

What the tax includes.

A tax upon capital stock is a tax upon the bonds and securities of which it is exclusively composed. No tax can be imposed by the law or authority of any State, upon the bonds in which the capital of a bank is invested, nor upon any person, society or corporation in the relation of owner of said bank; yet this would be done by taxing the capital stock of the bank. These doctrines are well settled by adjudged cases in this and other courts. Weston v. Charleston, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 449, 7 L. ed. 481; New York v. New York Tax Comrs. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 620, 17 L. ed. 451, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 200, 17 L. ed. 793; Whitney v. Madison, 23 Ind. 331.

Judicial construction of the Illinois statute.

The words "capital stock," as used in the Revenue Law of Illinois, mean the property of the corporation, and not the shares of the stock owned by the shareholders, either separately or in the aggregate.

It was competent for the Legislature, under the State Constitution, to require the capital stock of corporations, as thus construed, to be assessed for the purpose of taxation against the corporation.

The franchise of a corporation is property, and as such it may be a proper object of taxation, in proportion to its value, the same as other property.

This construction of the Statute is sustained by the general current of authority. Bank of the Republic v. Hamilton County, 21 Ill. 53; Rome R. Co. v. Sullivan, 14 Ga. 275; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 30 Mo. 650; New Haven v. New Haven 12 L. R. A.

Co.* 78 Ill. 551; State Tax on Railway Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 290, 21 L. ed. 168; Society for Savings v. Coita, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 594, 18 L. ed. 397; Cooley, Const. Lim. 496.

In "Duty on Taxation" it is said: "The mode of collecting the tax on the shares of a corporation, by requiring its officers to pay the tax directly into the treasury of the State, is a valid mode, even in the case of the national banks. Louisville First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701; McVeagh v. Chicago, 49 Ill. 313; State v. Mayhew, 2 Gill, 457; New Orleans v. Louisiana Sav. Bank, 31 La. Ann. 329; Barney v. State, 42 Md. 480.

A railroad company required to pay to the State one fifth of its fares collected cannot plead the unconstitutionality of the Statute requiring such payment, in a suit for the recovery of the moneys so collected." State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 34 Md. 344.

It will be necessary always to consult the charter law of the corporation to be assessed, or the statute law under which the assessment is to be made, in order to determine the course to be pursued in making the assessment. Corporations are generally required to furnish sworn statements of their property with values. These furnish the basis for the assessment, but are not conclusive; other values may be given by the assessors, ascertained from other sources of information. Walty, Assessments, § 121.

Comments of the New York Court of Appeals.

Commenting upon this position, the New York

how much in personal property, and so, no doubt is left that by "capital stock" was meant simply the "capital" possessed in cash or invested in securities or real estate.

The illustrations might be multiplied and fortified by reference to numerous acts relating to the formation or management of manufacturing, railroad business, and telegraph companies, in which the two forms of expression are used indiscriminately and as convertible terms; but I think quite enough has been said to require unhesitating assent to the proposition that, under the Law of 1857, the thing to be taxed is the capital of the Company, and not the shares of the stockholders. Indeed, I should feel bound to apologize for arguing what seems to me so simple and plain a proposition, were it not for the fact that it has been largely ignored by assessors, and not always clearly kept in mind by the courts, and but for the further fact that the right to adopt, as the taxable valuation, the value of the shares, totally disregarding the value of the Company's capital, has been asserted in this case, maintained by the courts below, and claimed to be fully justified by very much which we ourselves have decided or said. Before examining the cases in detail, to see whether they hamper our freedom of judgment upon the question presented, I think it safe, and also prudent, to assert three things as applicable generally, and to all the cases alike: first, this court has never decided, either by a direct determination or by necessary implication, that the Law of 1857 authorizes the imposition of a tax upon anything else than the actual capital of the corporations, together with their surplus; second, that the precise question whether the capital of the companies or the share stock of the shareholders forms the basis of valuation, and the thing to be assessed, has not been heretofore formally and distinctly presented; and, third, that all seemingly erroneous expressions of opinion are corrected at once when they are referred to the permissible conditions under which the value of the share stock in the market may be referred to, not as the thing to be valued and assessed, but as an aid or help in discovering the value of the other and different thing which is to be valued and assessed. Keeping these general propositions in mind, we now recur to the cases.

The most important, because it opened the door and led the way to some doubtful modes of expression, is that of Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449. That was an action against the assessors to recover damages for having laid an assessment upon the plaintiff company without jurisdiction and in violation of law. Two grounds of liability were asserted,—one, that the business residence of the corporation was at Auburn, in the County of Cayuga, and the assessors of Oswego had no jurisdiction to assess it at all; and the other, that the valuation was excessive, and based upon the share value and the fact of a successful and lucrative business. The report of the case shows merely that, after deducting from the par capital the assessed value of the real estate, the assessors added to the balance 75 per cent to reach actual value. I have examined the original case preserved in our records, and it de-

Court of Appeals, through Mr. Justice Denio, says: "If it were alleged that this" (the nominal capital) "did not represent its" (the stock's) "actual value it would be their duty to look at its market price, and if necessary, to ascertain the character and worth of the securities in which its funds had been invested. It would be equally their duty to inquire whether any of his property, into which the capital had been converted, was exempt by law from taxation. Prima facie, it may be that the nominal amount of the capital would be considered its actual value, but where it should be shown that it" (the corporation) "had met with losses, or that its investments had otherwise depreciated, other means would have to be resorted to, in order to ascertain the actual value of the assets in which its capital consisted. The market price of its shares would ordinarily furnish a practical test; but either the assessor or the taxpayer would have a right to examine and have an estimate made of the value of the securities." People v. New York Tax Commrs. 28 N. Y. 194.

Comments of the Missouri Supreme Court.

In the case of State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 37 Mo. 268, the court says: "If the property of a corporation is taxed in the hands of the stockholders, it cannot be taxed in the hands of the corporation also. A corporation is taxable, like a natural person, but it is not to be taxed twice."

Comments of the California courts.

The courts of California expressly recognized the effect of an assessment upon corporate property and the assessment of its shares in the hands of its stockholders as involving a double taxation, and hence illegal. Section 3608 of the Political Code is an expressly legislative prohibition of such a method of assessment, and is couched in the following language:

"Shares of stock in corporations possess no intrinsic value over and above the actual value of the property of the corporation which they stand for and represent, and the assessment and taxation of such shares and also of the corporate property would be double taxation. Therefore all property belonging to corporations shall be assessed and taxed, but no assessment shall be made of shares of stock, nor shall any holder be taxed therefor."

Under judicial interpretation of this section, it had been held that to assess all the corporate property to the corporation and the shares of the stock to the holders thereof is double taxation, and is prohibited. Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594.

"Capital," eo nomine, was held taxable in San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 54 Cal. 571, but a corporation cannot be taxed on capital stock which it does not hold. People v. National Gold Bank, 51 Cal. 508.

National bank stock invested under the Banking Act of 1864, in federal securities, cannot be taxed, nor can the corporation be taxed as the owner of such securities. Bank Tax Case, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 200, 17 L. ed. 738; Collins v. Chicago, 4 Ill. 472; Sumner County v. National Bank of Gainesville, 62 Ala. 464; New York v. New York Tax Commrs. 37 U. S. 3 Black, 620, 17 L. ed. 451; New Orleans v. People's Bank, 27 La. Ann. 646.

Tax on shares of stock as distinguished from the other methods.

The distinction outlined in the principal case sufficiently indicates the importance of distinguishing a tax on shares of stock held by individual holders and a tax on capital stock. In an exhaustive note appended to section 563, Cook on Stock and Stockholders says: "In the case, Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 76 Ill. 561 (1875), the velopes a state of facts very much broader than the report of the case indicates. The corporation had made no list or statement of its assets, as required by law. It chose to leave the assessors in the dark, and furnish them with no information. They were compelled to act upon such facts as they could ascertain. They knew the prosperous character of the business, and had reason to believe that the company had a large surplus, but could not ascertain how much. In this dilemma they inquired as to the value of the share stock, and claim that they found it worth nearly double its par. Thereupon they added a part of that premium to the nominal capital, as being the actual value of the capital and its accretions in the form of surplus. In all this there was no attempt to assess the share stock, but simply an effort to get at the actual value of capital and surplus together. On the day for the hearing of objections, the president of the corporation appeared. He made an affidavit which claimed that the company could only be assessed at Auburn, but which uttered no word of complaint against the valuation put upon capital and surplus, and furnished no information on that subject. On the trial he testified that no other proof than his affidavit was put before the assessors. The latter in their answer explicitly deny that they took into account the value of the profitable business, or that they took as a basis the full value of the share stock. On such a state of facts, the decision which upheld the action of the assessors was entirely correct and sound, and in complete accord with the views which I have herein expressed. But, while the decision was right I am compelled to admit that some of the reasons in the opinion are open to criticism. Judge Denio does say, in substance, that the actual value of the capital may be swollen above its par value by crediting to it the money value of the fact that "the enterprise was happily chosen and skillfully conducted." But the Statute does not tax either the choice or the conduct. Those are the chief elements in the value of the franchise, and the law does not tax the franchise. If, as I think, may be the truth, the learned judge had in his mind that the happy choice and skillful conduct of the enterprise fairly indicated an accretion to capital of accumulated surplus, and meant only to say that the value of that accretion should be added to capital, then he kept within the boundaries of the Statute. But, beyond that, he intimated quite plainly that the value of the share stock is the fair equivalent of capital and surplus. In that conclusion I cannot concur, but I disagree with less reluctance because the learned judge himself, in a later case, very nearly corrected the error, even if he did not acknowledge it. That was the case of People v. Tax Comrs., 23 N. Y. 192. The question there involved was the right of the corporation to have deducted from the assessment that portion of its capital invested in United States bonds which had been issued without an express enactment exempting them from taxation. Judge Denio on this occasion again referred to the Statute of 1857, and modified his views so far as to say that the assessors "may look" at the value of the share court clearly recognised this distinction, and said: "The legal property of the shareholder is quite distinct from that of the corporation, although the shares of stock have no value save that which they derive from the corporate property and franchise, and a tax levied upon the property of the one is not, in a legal sense, levied upon the property of the other." See also Bradley v. Bauder, 36 Ohio St. 28 (1860). Cf. The Delaware R. Tax, 35 U. S. 18 Wall. 206, 230, 21 L. ed. 838, 894; Farrington v. Tennessee, 36 U. S. 679, 24 L. ed. 558, where the distinction is clearly drawn; Quincy Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 615. In the case of North Ward Nat. Bank v. Newark, 39 N. J. L. 380, the court said: "The moneyed capital of a bank is an entirely different thing from its capital stock. The former is the property of the corporation. It may consist of cash or of bills discounted, or be in part invested in real estate or in the securities of the federal government. In whatever form it is invested, it is owned by the bank as a corporate entity and not by the stockholders. The stock or shares represent the interests of the shareholders, which entitle them to participate in the net profits of the bank in the employment of its capital, and is a distinct and independent interest or property in the shareholders held by them like other property." The case of Porter v. Rockford, 21 L. & St. L. R. Co. supra, holds also that a tax on the 'capital stock' means the property of the corporation and not the aggregate of the shares of stock. See also State v. Hamilton, 5 Ind. 310 (1854), where the word 'stock' was construed to mean the tangible property of the corporation. But see Trask v. Maguire, 35 U. S. 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. ed. 938 (1873).

"And even though the value of the capital stock is estimated by the aggregate value [of the shares], it is still a tax on the capital stock. New Orleans & C. R. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 22 La. Ann. 19 12 L. R. A.

(1880). See also Virginia State Bank v. Richmond, 39 Va. 113.

"So also where the franchise is valued in that manner for taxation. Com. v. Hamilton Mfg. Co., 94 Mass. 298 (1866); Atty-Gen. v. Bay State Min. Co., 99 Mass. 148 (1868). Hamilton Mfg. Co. v. Massachusetts, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 632, 18 L. ed. 904 (1867), holds that a tax on the excess of the market value of the corporate realty and machinery is a franchise tax. In Indiana it is held that a tax on the shares of stock is the proper mode of taxation, unless the statute provides otherwise. Whitney v. Madison, 23 Ind. 331.

"The mere fact that the corporation is compelled to pay the tax does not prevent its being considered a tax on the shares. Louisville First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 353, 360, 19 L. ed. 701, 703, per Miller, J."

Extended review of the authorities.

Suggestive commentary is found upon laws regulating corporate stocks, and the method of their taxation in section 74 of Desty on Taxation, from which we extract the following: "A tax on the shares is in the nature of a tax on incomes. Memphis v. Ensley, 6 Baxt. 555; Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. 490. It is not a charge against the corporation, and is not payable by the receiver of a dissolved corporation. Relfe v. Columbia L. Ins. Co., 11 Mo. App. 374; Lionberger v. Rowe, 48 Mo. 97. Where they are taxable to the shareholders, it is not competent to tax the corporation itself, or the shares of nonresidents. State v. Thomas, 26 N. J. L. 181. Shares and stock are synonymous, within the requirement of the statute that each corporation must give in for taxation the part or portion of the capital stock which he owns. Harrison v. Vines, 46 Tex. 15. Shareholders are liable to be taxed on the market value of their stock, regard-stock, which, he adds, "would ordinarily furnish a practical test," and he cites his own previous decision. Four of the judges, concurring in the result, disagreed as to the construction of the Statute, and one, Judge Comstock, dissented entirely, and wrote out his views at length. That opinion shows that "capital" and "capital stock" are used indiscriminately to designate the estate of the corporation, and that such estate, and not the share stock, is the subject of the valuation. The report of the case leaves it probable that a majority of the court to that extent concurred. It is to be noted that in neither of these cases was the precise question now discussed formally or definitely presented, or necessarily involved, and that in neither opinion is it asserted that the share stock, instead of the capital, is the subject of taxation. That doctrine has arisen, if at all, as an inference from what was said, and not from what was decided. It is further to be observed that in these two cases Judge Denio betrays a consciousness that his test of share value is both unsound and applicable only in instances which compel it as a necessity; for—first, he says "there is, doubtless, an incongruity in including the accumulated profits above ten per cent in the assessment where the capital is assessed at its market value," and assigns as a reason what I have already said, that to assess the share stock assesses the surplus, and makes its specific mention wholly superfluous, and, second, he explicitly admits that "either the assessor or the taxpayer would have a right to examine and have an estimate made of the securities." That admission is fatal to any theory that the share stock is the subject of valuation, for, if it is, the value of the securities representing the capital is totally immaterial, and the right to have it valued depends upon its being the very subject of taxation.

less of the fact that the capital of the corporation has also been taxed, and that the same has been paid. Memphis v. Enaley, 6 Baxt. 553; Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 75 Ill. 551; Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449; People v. Tax Comrs. 23 N. Y. 218; Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888; People v. Bradley, 39 Ill. 144; Bank of Republic v. Hamilton County, 21 Ill. 54; Quincy Bridge Co. v. Adams County, 88 Ill. 615. The stock of a corporation is to be assessed at its actual value, whether above or below the nominal par, and irrespective of its possessing any surplus capital or reserve fund. Oswego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, supra. Where they have been assessed upon valuation of his shares they are not entitled to a reduction on account of indebtedness. People v. Dolan, 36 N. Y. 42. See Bank of Utica v. Utica, 4 Paige, 399, 3 L. ed. 437."

The Revenue Act does not make a corporation liable for taxes assessed on its capital stock when such capital is represented by shares of stock which are not the property of the corporation. People v. National Gold Bank, 51 Cal. 508.

So a tax upon the capital stock and franchise of a corporation is not a tax on the shares of the shareholders; where the personal property which a corporation was required to list for taxation embraced the capital stock, an owner of shares of the stock of such company is not required to list his shares for taxation. Jones v. Davis, 35 Ohio St. 474.

Capital and shares of stock are distinct property, and the exemption of the one will not necessarily 12 L. R. A.

Three other cases followed the two upon which I have commented in which the Statute was referred to,—People v. Dolan, 36 N. Y. 59; People v. Ferguson, 38 N. Y. 89; People v. Board of Assessors, 89 N. Y. 81. They related to the permitted deductions and exemptions, and can scarcely be said to bear upon our present inquiry, except inferentially, and the inferences which they suggest are certainly not in the direction of a right to value the share stock instead of the capital. We come now to the decision in People v. Tax Comrs., 95 N. Y. 554. It would be quite sufficient to say of that case that it involved in no degree the question here at issue. The sole conflict between the contending parties assumed that capital and surplus aggregated had been fairly and justly valued, and that the property to be taxed was such capital and surplus. The opinion aggregates them under the one name of "capital," which was not strictly correct, and yet was sufficiently so for the purposes of an inquiry, which did not depend upon any special discrimination between them. That discrimination was so carefully made by the same pen in Williams v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 93 N. Y. 188, as to leave no doubt that it was perfectly understood. The point of the case was to determine whether the real estate was to be deducted from the nominal capital stock or from the actual value of the "capital," using that word as including surplus, and whether at the value paid for it or at the value for which it was assessed on the assessment rolls. Those questions, and those only, were decided, and if in the process surplus was treated as part of capital, instead of an accretion beyond it, the aggregation was at the moment convenient and immaterial to any necessity of the case. It did no harm, then, but must not be allowed to prevent upon a different inquiry the discrimination which in fact exempt the other; so the taxation of one is not an imposition of a tax on the other. Memphis v. Farrington, 3 Baxt. 559. See New York v. New York Tax Comrs. 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 259, 18 L. ed. 350; Van Allen v. Assessors, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 573, 18 L. ed. 229.

Even if the shares of stock are erroneously assessed, it affords no reason why the capital stock should not be taxed. It is the fault of the shareholders if they pay an erroneous tax on their shares. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Pollak, 75 Ill. 238.

An exemption of the capital stock, without other words of limitation, may operate to exempt all the property of the corporation (Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 104 U. S. 495, 26 L. ed. 811; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091; Jones v. Davis, 35 Ohio St. 477; Bank Tax Case, 69 U. S. 3 Wall. 206, 17 L. ed. 735; Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 683, 24 L. ed. 590); and where the purpose for which a corporation may hold property is specified in connection with the exemption, the limitation of taxation designated must be held to apply only to property. Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co. 75 N. Y. 211; San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 54 Cal. 575.

Under the Tax Revenue Laws the capital of a domestic corporation must be taxed, and the shares of stock are exempted; but when a resident owns stock in a corporation created in another State, it is taxable against him. Porter v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co. 75 Ill. 551. When the capital stock is taxable, the shares of stock are exempt from taxation in the hands of stockholders. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Pollak, supra.

this court had already made. If beyond that words were used which indicate that our judgments had been affected by the opinion in the Oswego Starch Case, the result was natural, so long as attention was not drawn to an inquiry which would have developed the existing ambiguity and its cause.

The next case relied upon by the respondents is People v. Astor, 100 N. Y. 597, 1 Cent. Rep. 770. That again was a question, and a question only, of the mode of deducting the real estate. No dispute existed over the valuation of the company's capital stock. It was deemed worth exactly the par of its nominal capital, and both sides assented to that as its actual value. It was of no consequence to the decision how the assessors arrived at that value, since no question arose over it; and what was said in the opinion as to the right of the assessors to consider the market value of the shares and the dividend-earning power of the corporation was obiter, and needless to the sole questions at issue, which were whether the real estate should be deducted at the price paid for it, or at its assessed value on the rolls, and whether an incumbrance upon it in the form of a mortgage for $80,000 should or should not be deducted. Indeed, the remarks which I have characterized as obiter may, as we shall presently see, have been justified in their application to the action of the assessors by the existing circumstances which surrounded their actions, but which do not appear in the report of the case.

The next authority relied on by the respondents is People v. Tax Commrs., 104 N. Y. 240, 6 Cent. Rep. 881. There, again, the point involved respected solely the deduction of real estate, and the manner of ascertaining the value to be deducted. Not one word was said in the opinion as to what was meant by the actual value of capital stock and surplus, or what was the thing to be valued; for no question whatever was raised over that. The real estate of the company was a railroad situated in a foreign country. Not being assessed upon the rolls in this State or elsewhere, its assessed value could not be deducted, and resort was necessarily had to its actual value. The relator sought to estimate the value of the real estate by fixing, first, the aggregate value of the whole railroad, and then deducting the value of the equipment. This court combated that method on the ground that it imported into the value of the real estate the additional value of the franchise. When the opinion declared that "the value of the franchise of the corporation is an important element in determining the value of a railroad as a whole or the value of its capital stock," it meant exactly what it said, using the last phrase in the sense which is entirely apparent, viz., that of the share stock which represents the railroad as a whole, or the entire property of the company as a railroad company.

The final case to be examined is People v. Coleman, 107 N. Y. 541, 10 Cent. Rep. 266. It appeared that the relator's stock at par amounted to $210,000, while its share stock was selling below par, and for 90 cents on the dollar. But the assessors did not assess the share stock, nor take its value as the test of capital, and so showing no surplus but a deficiency. On the contrary, they went to the company's own books for information, and there found, not a deficiency, but a surplus; and, deducting from the aggregate of capital and surplus the assessed value of the real estate, United States stock, and the exempted 10 per cent, they found a taxable balance of about $25,000. The company resisted. Their counsel argued that "the assessment should not exceed the market value of the capital stock, less statutory exemptions." 107 N. Y. 542, 10 Cent. Rep. 267. By "capital stock" he plainly meant the share stock which was selling at 90. The counsel for the assessors insisted that "the market value of shares of stock of the corporation is not the proper and sole test of the value of the corporate capital." On that issue we sustained the assessment. In so doing, we necessarily decided that capital, swollen by surplus or diminished by losses, was the subject to be valued and taxed, and not the share stock; and that when the actual value of capital and surplus was known and established, in this case by the party's own books, no reference to the value of the shares could be permitted to lessen the valuation. The case, therefore, was correctly decided, and in entire accord with the doctrine which I have herein advocated. But the opinion contained a statement which has been cited as conclusive by the general term, and also on the argument at our bar, and to which I now refer, because it opens the way to the final point of the discussion, and to a fact which accounts for and explains most of the references to the value of share stock which are seemingly of a doubtful character. The language was this: "The law does not prescribe how the actual value of the capital stock of a corporation shall be ascertained. That is left to the judgment of the assessors, and in appraising the actual value they have a right to resort to all the tests and measures of value which men ordinarily adopt for business purposes in estimating and measuring values of property. They may take into account the business of the corporation, its property, the value of its actual assets, the amount and nature of its present and contingent liabilities, the amount of its dividends, and the market value of its shares of stock in the hands of individuals." Now, I do not desire to withdraw in any degree the concurrence which I yielded to this statement when the case was decided, but it must not be wrested from its application to the facts then before the court, and be made to do duty on a different and broader field. The corporation was a fire insurance company, with a wide range of contingent liabilities. It had made no statement to the assessors, and had left them to their own resources. Where that is so, what are the officers to do? Necessarily they must resort to such means of information as remain and are accessible, and in that emergency they may "look at," "take into account," consider, the market value of the shares. That is something very different from assessing the share stock, or making its value the conclusive measure of capital and surplus. Such reference is simply the result of necessity, a resort to the poorest means of information, and to the most deceptive and treacherous test, because the better means or truer test cannot be obtained.

How unreliable the test of share value may be, through the effect of gambling, false rumors, scarce money and panics, Judge Comstock describes in his opinion to which I have already referred; and yet there are cases in which it furnishes some aid to the judgment in the absence of accurate knowledge. It is such cases that the courts have had in mind when justifying a reference to the stock market, and not those in which the amount and value of capital and surplus were fully and faithfully disclosed; and so I think the authorities either fairly permit or fully justify the conclusions which I have reached, and which may be stated with reasonable accuracy thus: first, the subject of valuation and assessment is never the share stock, but always the company's capital and surplus; second, such capital and surplus must be assessed at its own value, and, when that is correctly known and ascertained, no other value can be substituted for it; third, where its amount and value are undisclosed and unknown, the assessors may consider the market value of the share stock, and the general condition of the company, as indicative of surplus or deficiency, and of the probable amount of either; fourth, they may further resort to such means of information when the amount of capital and surplus is disclosed, but the assessors have sufficient reason to disbelieve the statement, and such reason is founded upon facts established by competent proof.

If these conclusions are correct, it will follow that the assessment complained of should be canceled. The corporation presented to the assessors a sworn statement of its assets and liabilities. If it be true, there was nothing subject to assessment. But its truth is not questioned, and there is not the least reason to doubt it. The assessors did not doubt it. They merely deemed it immaterial, and so testified when examined. In other words, knowing with certainty the value of one thing, they claimed the right to affix to it the larger value of a different thing. Authorized only to tax against the company its capital and surplus, they assumed the right, practically, to tax it for the share stock held by individuals. They have not in terms claimed that the share stock is the subject of taxation, nor has the counsel who represented them on the argument, but both have maintained and defended what is the exact and complete equivalent. The right asserted is a discretion in the assessors, at their free will, to assess corporations upon and at the value of their capital and surplus, or upon and at the value of the share stock, independently of established facts, and whenever they please. The law gives them no such discretion. How it has been exercised, and how destructively to the rights of taxpayers, may be seen by comparing the action in this case with that in one of the cases which we have reviewed. Where the share stock was selling at 90, and so below par, the assessors refused to take that value, and went to the Company's books in search of a larger one, which they found and adopted. Here, where the actual value of capital and surplus is established so that they frankly admit the fact, they calmly disregard it, and fly to the larger value of the share stock. The Statute has given them no such right. They are not lawless rovers, wandering among corporations at will, but regular officers, bound by discipline and controlled by the law, and whose discretion exists within fixed and definite limits. It is said, and it is true, that large masses of personal property escape taxation, and the owners are persistent and artful, and not over-nice, in their efforts to avoid a just share of the public burdens, and so we should uphold faithful assessors in every attempt to do their full duty. I think this court will not be unmindful of the situation, but, before all, we must first ascertain, and then obey, the law. If in that process evils result or are disclosed, the remedy must be sought elsewhere.

It follows that the judgment and order of the General and of the Special Term should be reversed, and the assessment against the relator vacated and canceled without costs.

All concur, except Peckham, J., not voting, and Gray, J., absent.

APPEAL by defendants from decrees of the Circuit Court for Clay County directing bills filed against them to be taken as confessed for want of appearance after publication of notice to them as nonresidents. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. Bisbee for appellants.

Messrs. Fleming & Daniel, C. P. & J. C. Cooper, and A. W. Cockrell & Son, for appellees:

In England, before the 18th day of November, 1847, when the word "month" was used in a statute, without the addition of "calendar," or any other words to show the Parliament meant "calendar," it was understood to mean a lunar month.

Lacon v. Hooper, 6 T. R. 224, 1 Esp. 246.

In legal matters, a month means a lunar month.

Hart v. Middleton, 2 Car. & K. 9; Atty-Gen. v. Newbury Corp. 1 Coop. 883.

This was changed by 18 and 14 Vict., chap. 21.

Since the passage of the Florida Act, the common-law meaning of the word "month," importing a "lunar" month, has been changed, not by judicial action, but by statute law, in the following States as noted:

N. H. Gen. Laws 1878, chap. 1, § 8; Mass. Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 8, § 3; Me. Rev. Stat. 1883, chap. 1, § 6; Vt. Rev. Laws 1880, § 12; R. I. Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 24, § 11; Conn. Rev. In Loring v. Halling, 15 Johns. 119, 120, the word "month" in a statute was held to mean lunar month.

month. Comyns, Dig. Anno. (B); Parsons v. Chamberlin, supra; Snyder v. Warren, 3 Cow. 513, 505; Loring v. Halling, 15 Johns. 119.

In all legal proceedings, as in commitments, pleadings, etc., a month means four weeks. Tullett v. Linfield, 3 Burr. 1455; Talbot v. Linfield, 1 W. Bl. 450; Bex v. Adderley, Dougl. 463; Stackhouse v. Halsey, 3 Johns. Ch. 74, 1 L. ed. 547; Lacon v. Hooper, 6 T. R. 224.

Rule of the common law.

In all statutes a month signifies a lunar month, unless it appears to be clearly intended to be a calendar month; and in all legal documents and proceedings the legal month is a lunar month, except in bills of exchange and promissory notes, cases of lapse, and quare impedit, in which four cases months are deemed calendar months. Wood, Land. and T. § 57.

By the common law of England, a month is, in temporal matters, a lunar month (1 Steph. Com. 265; 2 Bl. Com. 141), the reason of which rule is explained to be, "not only because it is always one uniform period, but because it falls naturally into a quarterly division by weeks." Therefore a lease for "twelve months" is only for forty-eight weeks; but if it be for "a twelve-month," in the singular number, it is good for the whole year. Ibid. In statutes and deeds, "month" means a lunar month, unless expressly declared as calendar, or so appearing from the context (Comyns, Dig. Anno. B; Lang v. Gale, 1 Maule & S. 118; so in all contracts, unless a contrary intention appear, or unless a general understanding of trade to the contrary be proved (Dyke v. Sweeting, Wills, 595; Barksdale v. Morgan, 4 Mod. 185); so, in all legal proceedings, unless the month be expressly described as calendar. Tullett v. Linfield, 3 Burr. 1455; Talbot v. Linfield, 1 W. Bl. 12 L. R. A.

450; Bex v. Adderley, Dougl. 463; 3 Chitty, Bl. Com. 140, note.

In ecclesiastical matters, on the other hand, "month" means a calendar month. Catesby's Case, 6 Coke, 61b; 2 Rolle, Abr. 581; Copley v. Collins, 4 Hob. 179; Talbot v. Linfield, 1 W. Bl. 450; 1 Steph. Com. 265; Tullett v. Linfield, 3 Burr. 1455; Lang v. Gale, 1 Maule & S. 111; Bouvier, Law Dict. Month. So, by the custom of trade as in case of bills of exchange and promissory notes, a month is deemed a calendar month. Cockell v. Gray, 3 Brod. & B. 187.

This indeed is the universal rule of the commercial world, in regard, not only to negotiable instruments, but all commercial contracts. Story, Bills, § 330.

In Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and perhaps some other States (1 Hill, Abr. 113, note), a month mentioned generally in a statute has been construed to mean a calendar month. Avery v. Pixley, 4 Mass. 461; Brudenell v. Vaux, 3 U. S. 2 Dall. 302, 1 L. ed. 390; Com. v. Chambre, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 143, 1 L. ed. 776.

Computation of time must be by; calendar months. Com. v. Chambre, supra.

So where a lease provided that rents should be paid semi-annually on the first days of May and November, and that, if any installment should remain unpaid for one month the lessee's rights should cease, the time expired on the first day of June. The day on which the rent became due was to be excluded. Sheets v. Selden, 60 U. S. 3 Wall. 177, 17 L. ed. 822.

Early rule relaxed.

In the United States the old English rule is considerably relaxed, and the term "month" usually computed, and especially in statutes and judicial proceedings, as calendar. 4 Kent, Com. 94, 95, note.

alone the rule of the common law can be changed, has never been exerted in the direction of declaring that the word "month," when used in a statute, shall mean calendar month. Nor have the courts of Florida, in any instance, held that the word "month," as used in the statute bringing nonresidents into court by publication, means anything but "a common-law" month, a "lunar month."

Bacon v. State, 23 Fla. 47, interpreted in the light of Sheets v. Selden, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 177, 17 L. ed. 822, does not conflict with this view.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The causes in which the orders of publication were made were consolidated subsequently by an order of the court. Buddington, Wilson & Co. were complainants in one, and Philip J. Canova was the complainant in the other of them.

The order in the case in which Buddington, Wilson & Co. were complainants was made July 29, 1884, and directs that the Chester Construction Company and the Guaranty Trust & Safe-Deposit Company, bodies corporate organized under the laws of States of the United States other than Florida, and residing and having their principal places of business at stated places in such other States, appear and answer the bill on or before the first Monday of December, 1884, or that the bill shall be taken as confessed, and directs that the order be published once a week for four months in some paper published in Clay County. On the 15th day of January, 1885, an order was made reciting that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court, from the affidavit of H. E. Bemis, business manager, that the above order of publication (designating it) had been published in the named paper once each week for four consecutive months, and "one month having expired of the time thereby limited for appearance and answer," and that the defendants had failed to appear, adjudges that the bill be taken for confessed, and that the cause be proceeded in ex parte as against the two defendants.

The law under which the order of publication was made is the thirteenth section of the Act of November 7, 1828 (§ 8, p. 452, Thomp. Dig.; § 8, p. 154, McClell. Dig.), which provides that the order shall be published in any newspaper published in the circuit in which the bill is filed, as follows: "If the defendant resides in this State, but not in the circuit in which the bill is filed, for two months; if in any other part of the United States, for four months;" and, after stating "six months" and "nine months" as the periods of publication where the defendant resides in the West India Islands or in Europe, as the case may be, it reads: "Which publication shall be, when the defendant resides in the United States, once a week; and when he or she resides out of the United States, once a month, during the periods above described."

The first question to be decided is whether the word "month," as used in this Statute, means a lunar or a calendar month. Black-

In Georgia, however, the English rule is followed. Redmond v. Glover, Dudley (Ga.) 107.

In New York, it has been expressly reversed, it being declared by statute that whenever the term "month" or "months" is or shall be used in any statute, Act, deed, verbal or written contract, or any public or private instrument whatever, it shall be construed to mean a calendar and not a lunar month, unless otherwise expressed. 1 Rev. Stat. (1806) 615, § 4; 2 Burrill, Law Dict. title Month.

The word "month," when used in a statute or Constitution, means a calendar month, unless words are added showing that a lunar month was intended. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. v. Pumphrey (Md.) March 25, 1891.

The word was held to import a calendar month as early as 1794, in the circuit court for the District of Pennsylvania, in construing an Act of the Legislature (Brudenell v. Vaux, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 302, 1 L. ed. 390), and in 1808, in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, it was said that "in this State, as well before as since the Revolution, a month mentioned generally in any Act had immemorially been considered as a calendar month." Avery v. Pixley, 4 Mass. 460, 461; Guaranty Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M. R. Co. 139 U. S. 197, 85 L. ed. 116.

A statute which requires publication as against nonresident defendants to be made once a week for four months is not satisfied by a publication for sixteen weeks or four lunar months; the word "month" in contracts or statutes means calendar month. Guaranty Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M. R. Co. supra.

Statutory provisions on the subject.

The law takes no account of the fractions of a day, unless it be to prevent injustice. Blydenburgh v. Cotheal, 4 N. Y. 418; Duffy v. Ogden, 64 Pa. 240; Clute v. Clute, 3 Denio, 263. 12 L. R. A.

The term "month" is regulated by Statute in California, and section 17 of the Code of Civil Procedure enacts that the word "month" means a calendar month, unless otherwise expressed.

Where a statute directs the publication of notices a certain number of times a week for a specified number of months, it is requisite, not only that the number of weekly publications be observed, but that the prescribed length of time, calculated according to the calendar month, be followed. Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 347; Sprague v. Norway, 31 Cal. 173; 1 Wood, Land, and T. § 57.

From the cases, Parker v. Constable, 3 Wils. 25, and Right v. Darby, 1 T. R. 159, it appears that a notice to a tenant from year to year to quit the premises must be half a year, and not six calendar months, though the computation by the latter would be more simple and convenient; and that is understood to be the proper notice by the court of common pleas in Doe v. Snowden, 2 W. Bl. 1224; Catesby's Case, 6 Coke, 61b.

The term in its relation to promissory notes.

In computing the time when a note, payable at a certain number of months after date, will become due, the rule is to exclude the day of the date from the calculation and include the day of payment, when no days of grace are allowed. Bellasis v. Hester, 1 Ld. Raym. 280; Campbell v. French, 5 T. R. 212.

When a promissory note is dated on a day of any month, and made payable at a specified number of months after that date, without days of grace, it becomes due and payable on the same day of the date of the note (Hartford Bank v. Barry, 17 Mass. 94; Ripley v. Greenleaf, 2 Vt. 120); the months after date are then fully complete. Roehner v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 160.

stone, after stating that a year is a determinate and well-known period, consisting commonly of 365 days, and in leap-years of 366, says that a "month" is more ambiguous, there being in common use two ways of calculating months, either as lunar, consisting of twenty-eight days, the supposed revolution of the moon, thirteen of which make a year; or as calendar months of unequal length, according to the Julian division in our common almanacs, commencing at the calends of each month, whereof in a year there are only twelve. A "month," he says, is a lunar month, or twenty-eight days, unless otherwise expressed; not only because it is one of uniform period, but because it falls naturally into a quarterly division by weeks. Therefore a lease is only for forty-eight weeks; but if it be for "a twelvemonth," in the singular number, it is good for the whole year. For herein the law recedes from its usual calculation, because the ambiguity between the two methods of computation ceases, it being generally understood that by the space of time called thus, in the singular number, "a twelvemonth," is meant the whole year, consisting of the solar revolution. 2 Bl. Com. pp. 140-142.

A "month," in temporal matters, except in quare impedit, and at least some commercial matters, meant, unless a different meaning was shown to be intended, a lunar month; but in ecclesiastical matters it meant a solar month. Talbot v. Linfield, 1 W. Bl. 450; Lang v. Gale, 1 Maule & S. 111; Titus v. Preston, 1 Strange, 652; Cockell v. Gray, 3 Brod. & B. 186; Bayley, Bills, 288.

In Barkdale v. Morgan, 4 Mod. 185 (A. D. 1694), where, on a contract to pay "within one month next following," the decision was that the time should be reckoned a lunar month, the court said: "In common parlance, the month is taken to be twenty-eight days in all cases except in a quare impedit, and therefore it must be so many days, according to the common and known acceptation of the word."

In Lacon v. Hooper, 6 T. R. 224 (decided in 1795), where it was held that the word "month," infused in a statute without the addition of the word "calendar," or anything to show that the Legislature meant a calendar month, meant a lunar month, Lord Kenyon said that the rule had been so long established that it should not be shaken, but confessed that he wished that the rule as first established by the decisions had been otherwise.

That the rule in England was as stated above, until changed by Act of Parliament during the present reign, cannot be denied; and it is true that in New York the same rule of construction was followed. Leffingwell v. White, 1 Johns. Cas. 99 (decided in 1791), held that calendar months were meant in matters of bills of exchange (Stackhouse v. Halsey, 3 Johns. Ch. 73, 1 L. ed. 547); that a statute as to the advertisement of mortgaged property for sale "once a week, for six successive months," meant lunar months. Jackson v. Clark, 7 Johns. 217; Loring v. Halling, 15 Johns. 119.

In People v. New York, 10 Wend. 895, where a statute allowed the owners of land two years from the time of the sale for taxes within which to redeem, and required the municipal authorities to give public notice at least six months before the expiration of that period, 12 L. R. A.

for four weeks, it was held that "months" meant calendar months. "Now," says the opinion, "as calendar time is used by the Legislature in fixing the period for redemption, it is a just and reasonable inference that they intended to use it in fixing upon the division or point of time specifying the notice to be given to the owners to redeem. As the one period, in express terms, is calendar time, and the six months immediately succeed it, and were intended to include a part of it, it should be construed to mean the same; otherwise we must believe the Legislature intended to fix the different periods by different calculations of time, in the same breath and on the same subject, and without any conceivable purpose." See also Snyder v. Warren, 2 Cow. 518; Parsons v. Chamberlin, 4 Wend. 512.

In the last case a Statute authorized any justice of the peace who should be removed from office before the collection of the money due on any judgment rendered by him, to issue execution "at any time within six months after such removal." No calendar time was mentioned in the Statute, "but," it was said, "the days mentioned in the execution correspond merely to calendar time. Executions are to be issued within thirty or ninety days, and they are returnable within similar periods. There is reason, therefore, to believe that calendar time was intended."

The supreme courts of North Carolina and Delaware have, we find, adopted the English view (Rives v. Guthrie, 1 Jones, L. 84; State v. Jacobs, 2 Harr. (Del.) 548); and there is in Georgia a superior court decision to the same effect. Redmond v. Glover, Dudley (Ga.) 107.

If the supreme courts of any other of the States have adopted or approved the English view, neither our own investigation nor those of counsel have discovered the fact. It has, on the contrary, been repudiated by many of the courts, for reasons that must commend themselves. Taking, in somewhat alphabetical order, the States in which there have been decisions on the subject, we find that in Alabama, in Bartol v. Calvert, 21 Ala. 42, where the term "months" was used in a Statute in 1848, in prescribing the time for filing claims against insolvent estates, they were held to mean calendar and not lunar months. Says the opinion, after recognizing the English rule to be as stated above: "In the United States there is some conflict of decisions, but the current of authority is to the reverse of the English rule. The general rule established by the American cases commends itself strongly by its superior convenience, its correspondence with our business transactions, as well as the received understanding in the community of the meaning of the term; and for these reasons we adopt it in preference to the English rule."

In Gross v. Fowler, 21 Cal. 398, where the term was used in a statute fixing the period for the redemption of property from judicial sales, it was held to mean calendar months. We must construe it, says the court, as we would any other term which the Legislature has used, and to which it has not affixed a special definition. It is not a technical term, and therefore it must be taken in its ordinary and general sense. In the general and popular use of the term, calendar months are always intended.

In Strong v. Birchard, 5 Conn. 357 (A. D. 1824), where the question was whether the time of an execution levied on land had expired by not being recorded within "four months" from the rendition of the judgment, it was held that the calendar months was its meaning. Having stated the law of the mother country as above, in its application to different subjects, the supreme court of that State said: "This fluctuation in the construction of a word cannot fail to produce more uncertainty and inconvenience than is counteracted by any imaginary benefit when considering it as generally possessing one signification, but occasionally admitting of another. Of this opinion was undoubtedly Lord Kenyon in Lacon v. Hooper.

... Uniformity in the construction of a word not used technically, nor governed by the subject matter, is not only desirable but unquestionably proper, and the proper meaning of a term used in a statute, made to be understood and practiced upon the people, is the only intendment that ought to be adopted. Upon this sound and obvious principle, in this State, as well as in the sister State of Massachusetts, the word 'month' has invariably been expounded to mean calendar month; that is, to mean what everyone not a lawyer by profession believes the word to mean." The chief justice remarked also that the point was solemnly decided thus more than thirty years before by the superior court. The decision in Avery v. Pixley, 4 Mass. 459 (A. D. 1808), on a statute requiring appeal from the probate court to be claimed within "one month," was that it meant a calendar month; and it was said that in that State, as well before as since the Revolution, a month mentioned generally in a statute had immemorially been considered a calendar month. See also Churchill v. Merchants Bank, 19 Pick. 532, 535.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held in 1794, in Com. v. Chambers, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 143, 1 L. ed. 778, that the computation of time under the Act of 1780, for the gradual abolition of domestic slaves attending upon persons passing through or sojourning in the State, provided they be not retained in the State "longer than six months," must be by calendar months, the court remarking that the same expression in other statutes of the State had uniformly received the same construction.

In Shopley v. Garey, 6 Serg. & R. 539 (A. D. 1821), after referring to the fact that in the mother country a "month" was in common parlance formerly understood to mean twenty-eight days, and hence the English rule of the common-law courts, the court says that however wise this rule may have been in its origin, the reason of it has long ceased, at least in this country, where the popular understanding on the subject is so entirely changed that in all the transactions and business of life the month is universally estimated by the calendar, and the lunar month never enters into the contemplation of anyone. In South Carolina, in the case of Alston v. Alston, 3 Brev. 469, 2 Tread. L. 604 (decided in 1814), the term "months," in an Act of 1785 relating to the recording of marriage contracts, was decided to mean calendar months. The reasoning of the court was that in common parlance "month" means calendar month; that in some of the law books it was laid down that it meant lunar month, but the universal method of computing time in that State was by calendar months, and the members of the Legislature must be presumed to have used the word in the Act in the same manner as they would have used it on any other occasion.

In Williamson v. Farrow, 1 Bailey, L. 611 (A. D. 1830), the decision was that the word, when employed in that State in statutes or in judicial proceedings, meant calendar month, and that it was to be understood in the same sense in all matters of contract, unless the parties have obviously intended it to mean a lunar month. The Supreme Court of Virginia held in Brewer v. Harris, 5 Gratt. 285, the meaning of a Statute requiring that indentures of apprenticeship should be filed within "six months" from the date of the order authorizing them to be executed, to be calendar months, and said: "We know perfectly well that with us, by general usage and popular acceptance, whenever the word 'months' is used, without qualification or explanation, in common parlance or business transactions, it is understood to mean calendar, and not lunar, months. Now, in the use of language not technical, the Legislature must be supposed to express their meaning according to the sense in which it will be understood by the persons for whom they legislate. And that, in point of fact, this word has uniformly been so employed, we also know, from the whole course of our legislation and judicial proceedings. It is impossible, therefore, that the legislative will, thus indicated, can be controlled and perverted, and extensive mischiefs introduced into our jurisprudence, by the application to the subject of English adjudications. Whatever may be the meaning in this respect of the English statutes (founded originally upon a different usage and habit), such is not the meaning of our Virginia statutes; and that is all upon such a question which it is our province to adjudicate."

The Circuit Court of the United States, sitting at its April Term, 1794, in the district of Pennsylvania, held in the case of Brudenell v. Vaux, 2 U. S. 2 Dall. 302, 1 L. ed. 390, that the term in question, as used in the Mortgage Recording Act of that State, meant calendar months; and the Supreme Court, in a case from Indiana (Sheets v. Selden, 60 U. S. 2 Wall. 177, 17 L. ed. 823), held that the term "months," when used in contracts or deeds, must be construed, where the parties have not given it a definition, and there is no legislative provision on the subject, to mean calendar, and not lunar, month. The term, said the court, is not technical, and when the parties have not themselves given it a definition, it must be construed in its ordinary and general sense, and there can be no doubt that in this sense calendar months are always understood, and that the reasons upon which a different rule rests in England, with reference to other than mercantile contracts, do not outweigh this consideration. That court in Hunt v. Wickliffe, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 201, 7 L. ed. 397 (A. D. 1829), following what it understood to be the decision of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, held a requirement of a statute of that State for the publication of an order of the kind now under consideration for two months, was not answered by a publication of eight weeks.

It is evident from these authorities that the English rule has not been followed generally in this country, but, on the contrary, it has oftener been repudiated. There the features of uniformity of period and of the divisibility into equal quarterly periods so commended the lunar month that, by common acceptance, the word "month" became and was understood to mean, in its ordinary use, a lunar month, and this meaning was held by the courts to be the one intended by the law-making power when using it. Neither the reasons which commended the lunar period to the people of England, nor any other considerations, have caused its general adoption by the people of our own country. The rule which had become the source of judicial regret there, as early as 1795, has never been generally established here. Common usage has adopted the calendar periods, and the courts hold that the law-making power should be understood to have used the term in the same sense as the people use it, and should give that effect to it which by common acceptance it has, and is in common parlance intended to convey, when used by the people. There is no inconsistency in the reasons controlling the English courts and the majority of those of this country. Each has given to a word, not technical, the meaning and effect which it has by common understanding in the territorial jurisdiction spoken for. The meaning of the word "month," as commonly used and understood in Florida, is a calendar month. Nobody uses it, or understands it to be used, as meaning anything else, where a contrary meaning is not expressed. There is nothing to suggest that it ever had any other commonly accepted meaning in this State. If it ever had, the present acceptance would doubtless be based upon Statute. There is no statute. Should we hold that this Statute means lunar months, we would not only disregard the weight of authority, and what we deem the sounder reasons, but we would defeat the intention of the law-makers. That the Legislatures of thirty-five States and Territories may have defined the term "month" to mean a calendar month cannot be regarded as satisfactory evidence that its meaning was otherwise in the respective jurisdictions of any of them other than New York, North Carolina and Delaware, and perhaps Georgia, when we consider that it has been adjudicated in at least six or seven of the thirty-five to mean a calendar month.

This question was considered in the case of Bacon v. State, 22 Fla. 46, in connection with the use of the word in a judicial order allowing time for settling a bill of exceptions, and the conclusion reached was consistent with the views expressed above. See also Guaranty Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Green Cove Springs & M. R. Co. 139 U. S. 187, 35 L. ed. 116.

The "four months" for which the Statute requires an order of this kind published are calendar months, and this term of publication is a continuous period equal to four calendar months preceding the day fixed by the order for the nonresident defendants to appear and plead (Smith v. Thompson, 8 Ga. 28), which day, in the case in which Buddington, Wilson & Co. were complainants, was the 1st day in December, 1894. This first Monday fell on the first day of that month. If the record does not show that the order was published once a week for the four months preceding the appearance day, the decree pro confesso was erroneously made. The only proof of publication appearing in the record is the affidavit of Bemis, referred to in the decree, with which proof the decree is to be considered in connection. Hartley v. Bloodgood, 16 Ala. 233; Hansom v. Patterson, 17 Ala. 788; Oillum v. Branch Bank of Mobile, 28 Ala. 797; Keifer v. Barney, 81 Ala. 192; Randall v. Songer, 16 Ill. 27; Settlemyer v. Sullivan, 97 U. S. 444, 24 L. ed. 1110; Allen v. Blunt, 1 Blatchf. 490; Cissell v. Pulaski County, 10 Fed. Rep. 891.

This affidavit was made on the 15th day of December, 1894, and states that the order was "duly published for nineteen consecutive weeks prior to this date, to the best of his knowledge and belief," having previously stated that the newspaper was published weekly in the Town of Green Cove Springs, in Clay County, in this State. It does not state what was the first day of its publication, unless we can consider a date appearing in the printed copy of the advertisement of the order attached to and mentioned in the affidavit. This date is below the order, and is as follows: "Aug. 9th, 4 s. 4 mo." and our understanding of it is that it is the usual printers' mark, denoting the day of the first insertion, and that it occupies four squares, and is to be published four months. In Langdon v. Poor, 20 Vt. 18, the date appearing on a tax collector's advertisement was held to be at least prima facie evidence of the time of making it. It is, however, unnecessary for us to invoke this rule or consider this date in reaching the conclusion to be announced, and we do not do so, though it would be fatal to the sufficiency of the publication or validity of the decree. So, neither the initial nor the final publication being shown, we cannot tell on what day the period of nineteen consecutive weeks mentioned in the affidavit began or ended. It may have ended with the 14th or 18th day of December, and, if it did, the first publication was on either the 8d or 2d day of August; and, if such was the fact, there was not a publication of four months prior to the return day, or December 1. The order was made in Madison County, in an adjoining circuit to that in which Clay County is, on the 29th day of July; and consequently the first publication must have been either on the 29th, 30th, or 31st of that month, or on the 1st day of August, to admit of four months' time prior to the return day; and, if the first publication was not on one of these four days, there could not have been the required notice. It is impossible for this court, upon the proofs before it, to say that such publication was on either of these four days, or, on the other hand, that it was not on the 2d or 8d days of August; and the same may be accurately said of the circuit judge who granted the order, he having the same and no other evidence before him. The record, then, does not show that the requisite notice was given, and it is certainly not for us to presume jurisdiction. Jurisdiction must be affirmatively shown by the record, where the parties are shown to be nonresidents, and constructive service is depended upon for jurisdiction. This is the rule, even where the jurisdiction is attacked collaterally. Freem. Judgm. § 127; Allen v. Blunt, supra; Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 350, 21 L. ed. 959.

The order of publication in the case wherein Philip J. Canova was complainant was made May 2, 1884, and requires the Chester Construction Company to appear and answer on the first Monday in September following. The affidavit of publication made by Bemis is dated September 1, of the same year, and states, inter alia, that the order was published for "seventeen consecutive weeks prior to this date, to the best of his knowledge and belief." The fact, however, is that the first Monday in September was the first day of that month, and it is hence apparent that there were not four months from the date of the order to the appearance day, counting either of such days and omitting the other, and hence there could not have been four months' publication prior to appearance day. The error of the order is apparent upon its face.

It is perhaps well for us to say that proofs of publication should be positive, and the sufficiency of the affidavits made simply to the best of the deponent's information and belief, as those above were made, is at least questionable.

No jurisdiction was obtained of the trust company, nor of the construction company, in the former of the two cases, nor of the latter company in the other case.

The appeal taken in the name of the Green Cove Springs & Melrose Railroad Company has been dismissed, thus leaving the two companies named above as the sole appellants. No relief was asked or adjudged in favor of the railroad company against either of these appellants; and neither that company, nor anyone else, can complain that it is not now before this court.

It is not necessary, nor do we deem it proper, to discuss any of the other questions raised by the petition of appeal. The decision of all of them was made in the lower court without appellants having a legal opportunity to be heard, and upon a record by which they are not bound.

The decrees appealed from, in so far as they affect the two appellants, or either of them, should be reversed for the reasons indicated above; and it will be so ordered.

NOTE.—Sales of corporate stock; specific performance of contract.

Equity will in a proper case compel the specific performance of a contract for the transfer of corporate stock. Cowles v. Whitman, 10 Conn. 121; Draper v. Stone, 37 Me. 175; Leach v. Forbes, 11 Gray, 506; Bissell v. Michigan F. & M. Bank, 5 McLean, 495; Taylor, Corp. § 790, cited in 2 Beach, Corp. § 624.

Where money damages can afford no adequate compensation, equity will enforce the performance of the contract. Chater v. San Francisco Sugar Ref. Co. 19 Cal. 219, cited in *Treasurer v. Either party may be entitled to specifically enforce the contract on the principle of mutuality of rights and remedies. Walker v. Bartlett, 2 Jur. N. S. 643; Paine v. Hutchinson, L. R. 3 Eq. 257.

Option contracts, when not illegal.

tracts for the delivery of shares of stock; but when a purchaser has bargained for or taken an option upon such shares, because they have to him a unique and special value, the loss of which could not be adequately compensated by damages at law, the chancellor, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may decree specific execution.

A contract by which stock is sold at a certain price, with option to the purchaser to resell it at a future time for an increased price, to the amount of interest which would to that time accrue, is not a gambling contract. Richter v. Frank, 41 Fed. Rep. 859.

So a contract for the sale of stock without delivery is not necessarily void, even if time for delivery is not fixed and either party may enforce its performance within a reasonable time. Bruce v. Smith, 44 Ind. 1; Kelchner v. Gettys, 18 S. C. 531; Stewart v. Canty, 5 Mees. & W. 160.

The mere fact that at the time of the fulfillment one of the parties makes default, and the parties settle upon the basis of the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time of the breach, does not render the contract void as a gambling contract. Bruce's App. 55 Pa. 294; *Smith v. 3. Where the remedy at law would be incomplete and inadequate, because the court of law could not give a conditional or modified judgment, and would be unable to preserve the benefit of the agreement to all the parties interested, equity has jurisdiction to enforce the agreement.

APPEAL by defendant Leavitt from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wood County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract for the purchase of certain shares of stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. N. Tavenner, for appellant:

While in the case of realty there is a conclusive presumption that the purchaser cannot be adequately compensated by the recovery of damages at law, in the case of personalty there is no such presumption.

3 Parsons, Cont. p. 866, note X. and authorities cited.

The general rule is that contracts as to personalty will not be specifically enforced.

3 Parsons, Cont. pp. 863, 864.

The question in all cases is this: Will damages at law afford an adequate compensation for breach of the agreement? If they will, there is no occasion for the interference of equity; the remedy at law is complete.

2 Benjamin, Sales, pp. 1143, 1144; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. Am. ed. 1876, p. 1096; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 218; Mitford & Tyler, Pl. & Fr. Eq. p. 214, citing Ord v. Butler, 1 P. Wms. 570, cited in 10 Ves. Jr. 161; Mason v. Armistage, 13 Ves. Jr. 87; Noyes v. Marsh, 123 Mass. 286.

Shares of stock constitute personalty, although the corporation own realty.

Edwards v. Hall, 35 Eng. L. & Eq. 433; Typpets v. Walker, 4 Mass. 595; Johns v. Johns, 1 Ohio St. 350.

In no case will it be found that a court of equity, at the suit of the vendor, has compelled the vendee to specifically execute a contract for the purchase of shares of stock.

See Ross v. Union Pac. R. Co. 1 Woolw. 26. See also Pom. Spec. Perf. § 19; Orange & A. R. Co. v. Fulvey, 17 Gratt. 366; Laidley v. Laidley, 25 W. Va. 525; Peyton v. Cabell, Id. 540.

It is the manifest right of the purchaser to have a clear, marketable title, and a specific performance will not be decreed unless this requirement is fulfilled, nor when the title, as finally tendered, is subject to even reasonable doubt.

The certificate of stock in this case had been delivered to L. N. Tavenner, attorney for Arnolds, with assignment indorsed by the plaintiffs. This amounted to a transfer of the stock itself.

Having thus parted with the stock, the plaintiffs were unable themselves to perform a substantial part of the contract, as shown by the bill itself. Consequently, the defendant had the right to rescind, and the plaintiffs no right to enforce.

While it has been held that a bill in equity will not lie for the specific performance of an agreement to sell stock, yet if the stock is in railroads, and such like stock, equity will enforce a specific performance of a contract to sell the same.

Lucas, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit originated by the filing of a bill in chancery, by H. E. Bumgardner, a married woman, and H. F. Bumgardner, her husband, against C. P. Leavitt, and others, in the Circuit Court of Wood County. The female plaintiff alleges that the defendant Leavitt induced her to invest $1,000 in the Steamboat General Dawes, the proposed cost of which was $7,600. It was understood that the boat was to be put in a joint-stock company, in which the plaintiff H. E. Bumgardner was to have shares in proportion to the money she had advanced, as aforesaid. The plaintiff exhibits with her bill an agreement as follows:

"This article of agreement, made and entered into this the 14th day of July, 1884, between C. P. Leavitt, County of Wood, and State of West Virginia, and H. E. Bumgardner of Hockingport, Athens Co., Ohio, witnesseth, that the said C. P. Leavitt, in case of misunderstanding, or not being able to agree, or in case of death of Herman Bumgardner, agent, said Leavitt agrees to take the said stock of Mrs. Bumgardner at not exceeding cost, or, if boat depreciates in value, at fair cash valuation. The said Mrs. H. E. Bumgardner agrees to give said C. P. Leavitt the refusal over any other purchaser. The said stock referred to above is stock in the steamer General Dawes. [Signed] C. P. Leavitt."

And there is further exhibited the following notice:

"To Chas. P. Leavitt—

"Sir: I propose to sell you my stock in the Farmer's Trans. Co. in accordance with your contract of July, 14, 1884, at cost, or, if the boat has depreciated in value, at its fair cash valuation. Your early attention is called to this matter, the contingency having arisen under which you bound yourself to take said stock. [Signed] H. E. Bumgardner, by H. F. Bumgardner, Ag't. March 31, 1887."

The bill supplements the above written agreement, signed by C. P. Leavitt, by stating that it was a part of the consideration that the husband, H. F. Bumgardner was to have regular employment on said steamboat, of which C. P. Leavitt was to be master. It is further alleged that all of the interests, including the stock owned by Leavitt (which was a large majority of it), as well as that owned by H. E. Bumgardner, was capitalized into a corporation known as the Farmer's Transportation Company, or conveyed to said company. The steamer was valued at $7,600 at that time, and 760 shares of capital stock of the par value of $10 per share were issued, of which 100 shares were given to said H. E. Bumgardner, and 1½ shares to her husband, in order that he might be represented in the company. It is further alleged that C. P. Leavitt took charge as master, and pursuant to the agreement gave H. F. Bumgardner employment, but that they soon disagreed, and said H. F. Bumgardner was discharged. Plaintiffs proceed to aver that since such disagreement they have at all times been ready to give said Leavitt the preference of purchasing said stock, and have urged him to buy said stock according to his agreement, but he has steadily and persistently refused to do so, until the 31st day of March, 1887, when the above notice was written and served. They charge that there has been no depreciation in the value of the boat, but that it has been increased in size and capacity at a large expense, and its value enhanced in consequence. It is further alleged that one E. W. Petty, who is made a defendant, had attached the 101½ shares of stock in the Circuit Court of Wood County, in an action at law against H. F. Bumgardner. It is further alleged that the plaintiffs were largely indebted to J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold, both of whom were made defendants, and that the female plaintiff executed a lien upon the said 100 shares of stock to secure said indebtedness. By an agreement and compromise between the plaintiffs and said E. W. Petty his debt is reduced to $422, which it is agreed shall be paid him out of the proceeds arising from the sale of of said 101½ shares of stock; and by like agreement with J. W. and L. H. Arnold, they are to receive the residue of the proceeds of said sale as a compromise, and in full settlement of the indebtedness due them from the plaintiffs. Plaintiff H. E. Bumgardner, it is alleged, has always been ready, and has offered, and now offers, to specifically perform the said agreement on her part, by assigning and transferring said 101½ shares of the stock free and unincumbered, as of the 31st day of March, 1887. The prayer of the bill is that the court will declare the plaintiff to be entitled to a specific performance and execution of the said agreement, with interest on the said amount from March 31st, 1887; second, that the court will decree that the amount ascertained to be due said H. E. Bumgardner from said C. P. Leavitt may be paid over to said E. W. Petty and said J. W. and L. H. Arnold, as above set out; and, thirdly, for all proper accounts and general relief. The bill was demurred to by Leavitt, but the demurrer was overruled, whereupon C. P. Leavitt filed his answer, in which he admits the agreement as set out in the bill, so far as it goes, but he denies it was ever understood or contemplated that the said H. F. Bumgardner should have the right, at any time he might thereafter see fit, to require respondent to buy the stock of said H. E. Bumgardner, and to require respondent to pay therefor the original cost, but in truth it was intended to give respondent refusal and right to buy said stock at any time, provided he paid therefor as much as any other bidder, and provided, furthermore, that respondent so desired. He alleges that the boat is not worth more than $2,500, about one third of what she cost at the time said stock was issued; and that the present value of said 101½ shares in the bill mentioned is not worth more than $333.33½ at the outside. He denies that the stock has ever been tendered him, or that either of the plaintiffs have ever proffered the same at anything like a fair cash valuation. He admits that on or about the — day of July, 1887, he offered them $850 for the stock, although he knew that they had immediately before that offered it to another party at $800. He alleges that it had been assigned by H. E. Bumgardner to Mrs. J. W. Arnold, to secure payment of a debt, and the certificate was then held by one L. N. Tavenner, as attorney of said Arnold, who had notified the secretary of the corporation, and requested a transfer on the books. Respondent sets out also that the certificate was incumbered by a lien of said E. W. Petty, and he pleads that the plaintiffs had not title to said stock, and so could not carry out the agreement. Respondent further alleges that his said offer of $850 was made in good faith, and he was ever ready from the time he offered in 1887 to buy said stock to take the same, but his offer was not accepted, nor was there ever tendered to respondent the said stock at any time, nor could it be, since they had parted with the title. He denies that he ought in equity to be compelled to pay for the stock, which cannot be delivered, and is incumbered to the full amount of its value. J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold filed their joint and separate answer, in which they admit all that is said in the bill about the mortgage or the pledge of the stock to them, and admit that they have agreed that out of the proceeds arising from the sale E. W. Petty should be first paid, and that they would accept the residue of the proceeds in full satisfaction of their lien, and that they have accordingly authorized L. N. Tavenner, Esq., their attorney, to execute their release, in order that said H. E. Bumgardner may execute to said defendant C. P. Leavitt an unincumbered transfer of said 100 shares of stock in fulfillment of said H. E. Bumgardner's contract on her part, as set out in Exhibit No. 1 of the bill. E. W. Petty likewise answers, and admits all the averments of the bill as to his lien upon the stock by attachment, and also the agreement with reference to his payment out of the proceeds of sale.

A vast amount of testimony was taken, very little of which had anything to do with the case, the bulk of it seeming to be predicated upon some extraneous controversies, as to the earnings of the boat, and Leavitt's settlement with the corporation and stockholders. On the 10th of December, 1888, the case came on to be finally heard, and the court decreed that H. E. Bumgardner was entitled to specific execution of the contract; that demand was made by her on the 31st day of March, 1887; and that the 101½ shares of stock were then worth $866.60; and the said C. P. Leavitt is decreed to pay that amount, with interest from 31st day of March, 1887, aggregating the sum of $954.76, which he is to pay, with interest thereon from the date of decree. The money is to be distributed to the Arnolds and Petty in accordance with their respective liens, and agreements with reference to the same. The decree then proceeds to direct "that L. N. Tavenner, who is authorized in a writing filed in the papers in this cause to release the lien of said J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold upon one hundred shares of the stock aforesaid, to execute said release of said lien, and, in case said L. N. Tavenner shall fail or refuse to execute said release within ten days from this date, then Barna Powell, who is hereby appointed a special commissioner for the purpose, is authorized and directed to execute a release of the lien of said J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold, as aforesaid, upon the 100 shares of stock held in the name of H. E. Bumgardner and filed with the papers in this cause, which certificate of 100 shares, as well as the certificate of 101½ shares, now also in the file in this cause, are to be delivered to said C. P. Leavitt upon payment by him, or someone for him, to the defendants Petty and Arnolds and plaintiffs, the sum hereinbefore decreed by him to be paid." Leave was given the plaintiffs to sue out execution.

From this decree the defendant Leavitt has appealed to this court.

The first and pivotal question to be decided in this case is whether the court of chancery had jurisdiction to decree specific performance. If not, the bill should have been dismissed on demurrer. In the first place, regarding the defendant Leavitt as having for a consideration obtained the refusal of, or, as we may call it, the option on, this stock, could he have maintained a bill for specific performance against Mrs. H. E. Bumgardner in case she had refused to let him have the stock, and had insisted on selling it to someone else? This is an important question, because, if such relief could be granted to the purchaser were he to apply, the seller, who has given the purchaser such preference or option, is entitled to like relief by reason of the operation of the principle of mutuality of right and remedy. The general doctrine upon this subject is thus stated by Mr. Pomeroy: "It is not then sufficient in general that a valid and binding agreement exists, and that an action at law for damages will lie in favor of either party for a breach by the other; the peculiarly distinctive feature of the equitable doctrine is that the remedial right to a specific performance must be mutual." See Moore v. Fitz Randolph, 6 Leigh, 175.

This is a general rule, namely, that the right to a specific execution of a contract, so far as the question of mutuality is concerned, depends upon whether the agreement itself is obligatory on both parties, so that upon the application of either against the other the court would grant a specific performance. Duwall v. Myers, 2 Md. Ch. 401. Says Mr. Pomeroy: "It is a familiar doctrine that if the right to the specific performance of a contract exists at all it must be mutual. The remedy must be alike attainable by both parties to the agreement." Pom. Spec. Perf. § 165.

In the present case it appears that the defendant Leavitt, being the owner of about three fourths of the stock in a steamboat, entered into an agreement with a married woman with reference to $1,000 of the same stock. It is true that the contract was signed by him alone. The circumstance that it was signed by him alone is not material, since it is admitted by both parties that she entered into the contract, and was to be bound by it. Wat. Spec. Perf. §§ 268, 270. Neither is the fact that she was a married woman material in this State, since, by our Married Woman's Act, which went into operation in 1869 (see Code, chap. 66), a married woman may not only take and hold personal property, such as stocks, but, being such a stockholder, she may vote the same in any organized company; consequently she had the right of disposition and the power to sell or contract to sell. It is also true that, according to her statement, personal services entered into a part of the consideration of the contract, and it is a rule almost universal that a contract for personal services cannot be enforced against the party promising such services, and hence for the want of the requisite mutuality specific execution will not be enforced against the opposite party, unless the services have been actually performed, and the contract to that extent been executed, as was the case here. Pom. Spec. Perf. § 310.

These obstacles being disposed of, we may inquire, Had Mrs. Bumgardner persisted in selling this stock to a third party, contrary to her agreement, could Leavitt have asked the court of chancery to interfere by injunction, and to compel her to transfer the stock to him upon payment of the price stipulated in the agreement? The question of specific performance of contracts for the delivery of stock is frequently treated by the text-writers in an empirical and unsatisfactory manner, as if there were something peculiar in this character of personal property, which rendered it impossible to classify it under any general rule. Mr. Fry, for example, does not hesitate to say positively that a contract for the sale of stock will not be specifically enforced, although he afterwards admits that railway shares form an exception. Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 24, 27. Mr. Pomeroy's treatment of the subject is equally unsatisfactory. See Pom. Spec. Perf. §§ 17-19. The true principle would seem to be that, as a general rule, courts of equity will not enforce specific performance of contracts for the delivery of shares of stock, but when a purchaser has bargained for such shares, or taken an option upon them, because they have for him a unique and special value, the loss of which could not be adequately compensated by damages at law, the chancellor, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may decree specific execution. This principle we find laid down and insisted upon in the more recent work of Mr. Waterman (1881). "The same principles," he says, "govern in contracts for the sale of stock as in the sale of other property,—that is, if a breach can be fully compensated in damages, equity will not interfere; while it will do so when, notwithstanding the payment of the money value of the stock, the plaintiff will still lose a substantial benefit, and thereby remain uncompensated. If a contract to convey stock is clear and definite, and the uncertain value of the stock renders it difficult to do justice by an award of damages, specific performance will be decreed." Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 19. Among the many other cases cited in support of this proposition is the leading case of Doloret v. Rothschild, decided by Sir John Leach, Vice-Chancellor, in 1824, 1 Sim. & Stu. 590, in which it is said that a bill will lie for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of government stock, where it prays for the delivery of certificates which give the legal title to the stock. There are many other cases, however, both in England and America, which sustain the correct principle as laid down above, but which it is unnecessary to cite. In the present case the purchaser of the refusal of or option upon the stock in the steamboat was dealing for an article which he could not go upon the market and buy, and which no one could deliver to him but the holder, with whom he bargained. The shares of stock evidently had for him a peculiar value, which could not be compensated by mere damages, such as would be recovered at law. Their possession would enable him to control the company, and to retain his position as master of the vessel. For the same reason, therefore, that a contract for railway shares will frequently be specifically performed, viz., whenever such shares are being purchased for the purposes of organization and control, I think a court of equity would have interfered in this case in favor of C. P. Leavitt, had he filed a bill praying for its intervention. It follows, therefore, upon the ground of mutuality of remedy and reciprocity of obligation, that such a bill could be maintained by Mrs. Bumgardner. There is another ground quite as apparent as that stated above, and that is that the legal title to this stock had passed into the hands of a third party, who is properly made a co-defendant. In the case cited above of Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & Stu. 590, the vice-chancellor remarks: "I consider also that the plaintiff, not being the original holder of the scrip, but merely the bearer, may not be able to maintain any action at law upon the contract, and that, if he has any title, it must be in equity." So in the present case the plaintiffs are in a situation in which a court of equity sees its way clearly to administer complete and adequate remedial justice to all parties interested, whereas, if they were remitted to a court of law, if relief could be afforded at all, it could only be done by resorting to several actions, perhaps no less than three. Upon the general principle, therefore, of avoiding circuity of action, and affording relief where the remedy at law is inadequate, it was proper for the court of equity to exercise its jurisdiction. Whenever the remedy at law would be incomplete and inadequate because the court of law cannot give a conditional or modified judgment, and would be unable to preserve the benefit of the agreement to all the parties interested, equity has jurisdiction to enforce the agreement. In the case of Summers v. Bean, the general principle is thus declared by Judge Moncre (18 Gratt. 412): "Generally an adequate remedy may be had at law for the breach of a contract concerning any other personality than slaves, and therefore, as a general rule, a court of equity will not enforce the execution of such a contract. But sometimes an adequate remedy at law cannot be had for the breach of such a contract, and then its specific execution will be enforced in equity." As it was said in May v. Le Claire, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 218, 20 L. ed. 50, in order to oust the equity jurisdiction, the remedy at law must be "as effectual and complete as the chancellor can make it." The same principle is recognized by all the text-writers. See Fry, Spec. Perf. § 18; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 29. Mr. Waterman says tersely: "If, however, the remedy at law would be wholly inadequate or impracticable, specific performance will be decreed." Waterman, Spec. Perf. § 17. For these reasons, therefore, we think there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill. Upon the merits, although there was, as we have said, a great deal of unnecessary testimony taken, the plaintiffs' case might have rested, and no doubt did rest, upon the testimony of the defendant C. P. Leavitt himself. Out of the 168 questions propounded to him, of which some were frivolous, and nearly all impertinent, he is asked on the 108d question whether he did not offer Mrs. Bumgardner $850 for her stock, in order to get rid of Bumgardner, to which he replies: "Yes: I wanted to get rid of him. Here is one of the clerks right here who asked him what he would take for it at different times." 104th question: "Did you not make a proposition to buy the stock on account of your obligation under that contract?" Answer: "Oh, yes; several times. I guess the clerk here knows that I made offers at different times through Mr. Ritchie, and Mr. Baringer can testify to the same thing." The defendant further testifies that these offers were made in March, 1887, or a little after that time, and that the negotiations would have been concluded, except for some trivial and inconsequential dispute about matters foreign to the subject matter.

To take the defendant, therefore, at his own word, and fix the value of the stock at a price only differing by a few dollars from what he himself offered, with interest from the time of his offer, was a judgment of the circuit court of which he has no right to complain, and we think, therefore, that the decree complained of should be in all respects affirmed.

Re Election of Directors of the ARGUS PRINTING CO.

(....N. Dak....)

- *1. The pledgee of stock in whose name it stands on the corporate records has a right to vote the stock at a meeting to elect directors.
2. The pledgor has no right to vote such stock, but a court of equity will, in a proper case, compel the pledgee to give the pledgor a proxy.
3. One not appearing to be a stockholder upon the corporate records is not eligible to the office of director, under the Statute providing that only stockholders are eligible to that office; one who still so appears is eligible, and may vote, notwithstanding he has assigned the stock.

4. A vote of stockholders representing a majority of the subscribed capital stock is necessary to the choice of a director. There being no such vote, the election is declared illegal, and a new election ordered.

5. A stockholder holding a majority of the subscribed capital stock having acquiesced in the organization of a stockholders' meeting, and having participated in the business of the meeting as so organized, among other things having nominated persons for the office of director, cannot afterwards withdraw from the meeting, and organize another meeting, at the same time and in the same place, and by voting at that meeting elect the persons voted for by him the directors of the corporation. #### NOTE.—Of stock certificates in general.

The certificates of stock are not negotiable instruments so as to come within the rule governing bills of exchange and promissory notes. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 84 N. Y. 72; Stebbins v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 3 Paige, 360, 3 L. ed. 184; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 447; Mechanics Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 13 N. Y. 635; Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 336; Arnold v. Ruggles, 1 B. L. 165.

The transfer book is not the only evidence of the ownership of stock. The certificate, which has always been deemed prima facie evidence of ownership is the only evidence in possession of the owner, and, where there has been no transfer, is the only recognised evidence of title. Broadway Bank v. McElrath, 18 N. J. Eq. 24.

The holder of a certificate of shares of stock, accompanied by an irrevocable power of attorney to transfer them, is the apparent owner, and when he is the holder for value without notice his title cannot be impeached. Leavitt v. Fisher, 4 Duer, 1.

Holder of certificate may assign it as a pledge.

It has also been settled, by repeated adjudications, that, as between the parties, the delivery of the certificate, with assignment and power indorsed, passes the entire title, legal and equitable, in the shares, notwithstanding that, by the terms of the charter or by-laws of the corporation, the stock is declared to be transferable only on its books; that such provisions are intended solely for the protection of the corporation, and can be waived or asserted at its pleasure, and that no effect is given to them except for the protection of the corporation; that they do not incapacitate the shareholder from parting with his interest, and that his assignment, not on the books, passes the entire legal title to the stock, subject only to such liens or claims as the corporation may have upon it, and excepting the right of voting at elections, etc. Ang. & A. Schuyler, 84 N. Y. 80.

It is well settled that one to whom stock has been transferred in pledge, or as collateral security for money loaned, and who appears on the register of the corporation as the owner of the stock, is, in the event of insolvency of the corporation, chargeable as a stockholder for the benefit of creditors. *Adlerly v. #### Effects of pledgee's failure to transfer shares on company's books.

In cases where a pledgee for value, of stock certificates, has neglected to obtain, in compliance with statutory or charter provisions, a transfer of shares upon the books of the company and the issue of new certificates, he receives an equitable title only and is subject to the equities of third parties. Naglee v. Pacific Wharf Co. 80 Cal. 529; Weston v. Bear River & A. W. & M. Co. 5 Cal. 186; Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373; Rock v. Nichols, 3 Allen, 343; Union Bank of Georgetown v. Laird, 15 U. remain in the meeting first organized, and vote his stock there, and no one can prevent his voting his stock at that meeting, although his ballot may be rejected. Notwithstanding such rejection, had he voted his stock at the original meeting the persons voted for by him would have been elected directors, and under the Statute declared by the court elected.

6. A transferee of stock upon the corporate records is qualified to vote the stock, and to become a director, although the transfer was made for the express and sole purpose of so qualifying him, provided that it was not made in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme.

Sale accompanied with power of attorney.

A sale of the stock, with a transfer of the certificate indorsed with a power of attorney to the purchaser to make the necessary transfer on the books of the corporation, transfers to the purchaser the equitable interest and legal right of the vendor in the property evidenced by the certificate assigned. It completes the transaction between the vendor and the purchaser. But as regards the corporation and those who have a right to look to its records for the owners of the stock, the transaction is incomplete. The purchaser does not become vested with the absolute title of the stock—does not become a shareholder in the corporation—until the purchased stock is transferred to him on the books of the corporation. Cheever v. Meyer, 53 Vt. 66.

Mode in which stock is transferred.

The capital stock of a corporate company is not capable of manual delivery. The scrip or certificate may be delivered, but that of itself does not carry with it the stockholder's interest in the corporate funds. Nor does it necessarily put that interest under the control of the pledgee. The mode in which the capital stock of a corporation is transferred usually depends on its by-laws. Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443.

Pledgee holds equitable title.

The use of the stock certificates given as collateral security where made by the mere manual delivery 12 L. R. A.

of the certificate, without any accompanying power of transfer, invests the pledgee holding such collateral with the mere equitable title. He cannot upon default enforce his rights by the ordinary processes of sale, and is remanded for relief to a court of equity. Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 443; Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 606; Nisbit v. Macon Bank & T. Co. 12 Fed. Rep. 698; Ex parte Boulton, 1 DeG. & J. 163; Allen v. Dykera, 3 Hill, 593, 7 Hill, 497; Johnston v. Dexter, 2 McArthur, 530.

A person holding stock of a corporation, not as a shareholder, but merely as a pledgee, may bring an action on his own account, and in his own name, to protect his rights and interests as a pledgee, and is not required in such matter to act through the association. Baldwin v. Canfield, 20 Minn. 43.

Where stock was bought for a customer, which can be identified in the hands of any pledgee of the firm who has sold it, the customer may affirm the sale and claim the price at which it was sold. If the proceeds of stock thus identified have come into receiver's hands, the customers may reach them. If the stock has come to the receiver's hands unincumbered by any pledge, and the receiver still has it, the customer may reach and have a delivery of it by paying to the receiver the amount owing to the firm in respect to it. Chamberlain v. Greenleaf, 4 Abb. N. C. 173.

A pledgee can sell the pledge after an adjudication in bankruptcy against the pledgor. Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734, 24 L. ed. 138.

Bankruptcy or insolvency will not revoke or affect in any way stock in the hands of the pledgee as security for a debt, when such security is accompanied with a proper power of attorney. Hunt v. Roumanian, 21 U. S. 8. Wheat. 174, 5 L. ed. 589; Story, Ag. § 477-482; Dickinson v. Central Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 279.

A Vermont case holds that the pledgee of stock the parties, or otherwise inquire into the matters of complaint, and thereupon confirm the election, order a new one, or direct such other relief in the premises as accords with right and justice. This appeal must be decided as we determine which of two persons had the right to vote 546 shares of stock. The total amount of stock which had been issued at the time of the meeting to elect directors was 570 shares. At this meeting A. W. Edwards voted these 546 shares of stock for the following directors: A. W. Edwards, H. C. Plumley, N. R. Flint, Alexander Griggs, and William A. Stevens. At the same time and place one E. O. Faulkner voted these same shares for Alexander Griggs, W. A. Stevens, B. F. Spaulding, H. C. Plumley, and E. O. Faulkner as directors. In whom was the right to vote this stock? The stock at one time was the property of A. W. Edwards. For the purpose of securing a debt which he owed to J. J. Hill, this stock, with ten other shares, was transferred upon the corporate books to E. O. Faulkner, confidential clerk of Mr. Hill. Certificates representing the total number of shares, 556, were issued directly to Mr. Faulkner, the same being signed by Mr. Edwards as president of the Company, the old certificates held by Edwards being canceled. The stock, therefore, stood on the books of the corporation in the name of E. O. Faulkner. Where there has been no transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation a pledgee of such stock may not vote it. The beneficial ownership is still in the pledgor, and the records of the corporation still show him to be a stockholder. In none of the cases cited in which the right to vote was adjudged to be in the pledgor, instead of the pledgee, had there been a record of the transfer made. See McDaniels v. Flower Brooks Mfg. Co. 23 Vt. 274; Re Barker, 6 Wend. 509; Ex parte Willcocks, 7 Cow. 410; Strong v. Smith, 15 Hun, 222.

We have discovered an Oregon case in which stock stood upon the books in the name of the pledgee, but the court ruled that he could not vote it because he had no authority from the pledgor to make the transfer. This case we will refer to hereafter. In the case at bar the stock stood in the name of the representative of the pledgee upon the corporate records. Was he a bona fide stockholder within the meaning of our Statute which restricts the right to vote stock to those who are bona fide holders thereof? Comp. Laws, 2931. It may be stated, in this connection, that Edwards could not vote the stock, as the stock had not stood in his name on the books of the corporation for ten days prior to the election. Ibid. If, then, the representative of the pledgee could not vote the shares, no election of directors could be held, for no one else had a right to vote it, and without its being represented at the election no election of directors could be had, for the reason that these shares constituted more than half of the capital stock. At all elections or votes had for any purpose, there must be a majority of the subscribed capital stock represented, etc. Ibid. No person can be is not regarded as the owner, to the extent, at least, of entitling him to notice of a stockholders' meeting. McDaniels v. Flower Brook Mfg. Co. 23 Vt. 274.

It has been decided that dividends declared during the continuance of a pledge belonged to the pledgee; and this even, although the latter has failed to procure registration of the books of the corporation. Herrman v. Maxwell, 15 Jones & S. 247.

The person to whom scrip for stock has been delivered, with a transfer thereof, and power of attorney to perfect the transfer, is the legal owner of the stock, although the same has not been actually transferred on the books of the corporation. Hill v. Newichawanick Co. 48 How. Pr. 427.

While the pledgee under the authorities is entitled to the dividends on the stock pledge, on its redemption by the pledgor, who must account for the amount received (Edwards, Bailm. p. 300; Isaak v. Clark, 2 Bulst. 306), the pledgee is not required to retain in his possession the identical shares of stock originally received from the pledgor, if the transaction is a mere loan of securities; a return of other stocks of like nature, kind and amount is sufficient. Taylor v. Ketchum, 35 How. Pr. 239.

Who are entitled to vote the stock.

As to the pledgee's rights to vote certain shares held by him as collateral security, the general rule is said to be based upon the names disclosed by the stock register of the corporation. Any private agreement between the parties holding legal title to the stock and others is a matter between themselves with which the corporation has no concern. Re Long Island R. Co. 19 Wend. 37.

The Supreme Court of Nevada has held that the right to vote at stockholders' meetings is not governed by the fact that the party in whose name the stock is registered is merely the nominal owner. State v. Leete, 16 Nev. 242.

By statutory enactment in New York, stockholders in moneyed and railway corporations are entitled to vote after duly registering as stockholders for at least thirty days prior to the election. 1 Rev. Stat. chap. 18, title 2, art. 2, §§ 78-85.

These provisions have been substantially reenacted in many of the other States.

A transfer of stock until entered upon the books of the company confers on the transferee, as between himself and the company, no right beyond that of having such transfer properly entered. Until that is done, or demanded to be done, the person in whose name the stock is entered on the books of the company is, as between himself and the company, the owner to all intents and purposes, and particularly for the purposes of an election. People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 373.

It is a rule of extended application that a person holding stock as trustee, not only where he is duly registered as a stockholder in that capacity, but also where the trust relationship is not declared upon the books of the corporation, is entitled to vote upon shares held by him.

In Wilson v. Central Bridge Props., 9 R. I. 590, an equally well-settled principle allows a person who pledges stock as collateral security to vote upon it at all corporate meetings so long as it is not transferred on the stock ledger in the name of the pledgee. McDaniels v. Flower Brook Mfg. Co. 23 Vt. 274; Hopkin v. Buffum, 9 R. I. 513.

The principle is crystallized in statutory form in New York, and is thus expressed: "Every person who shall pledge his stock as aforesaid may nevertheless represent the same at all such meetings, and may vote accordingly as a stockholder." New York Laws 1848, chap. 40, § 17.

chosen director without a majority vote. § 2925, Id.

At the time the Legislature employed the word "stockholders" in the section prescribing the qualification of a voter at corporate meetings, that word had acquired a definite and fixed meaning, so far as a pledgee of stock was concerned. It had been repeatedly adjudged that a pledgee of stock whose transfer was upon the corporate records was a "stockholder," within the meaning of the Statute providing for the liability of stockholders for the debts of corporations. The general reasoning upon which these decisions were based was that the pledgee with a recorded transfer was a stockholder for the purpose of receiving dividends and voting at stockholders' meetings; and that he could not enjoy all of the benefits enjoyed by a stockholder without being subjected to a stockholder's liability. Said the court in Bank of New Orleans v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. ed. 448: "It is thoroughly established that one to whom stock had been transferred in pledge, or as collateral security for money loaned, and who appears on the books of the corporation as the owner of the stock, is liable as a stockholder for the benefit of creditors. We so held in Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 828, 24 L. ed.

818, and like decisions abound in the English courts, and in numerous American cases, to some of which we refer. Adderly v. Storm, 6 Hill, 624; Rosevelt v. Brown, 11 N. Y. 148; Holyoke Bank v. Burnham, 11 Cush. 183; Magruder v. Colston, 44 Md. 849; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Met. 585; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill. 296; Re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 199; Hale v. Walker, 31 Iowa, 344. For this several reasons are given. One is that he is estopped from denying his liability by voluntarily holding himself out to the public as the owner of the stock, and his denial of ownership is inconsistent with the representation he has made; another is that by taking the legal title he has released the former owner; and a third is that, after having taken the apparent ownership, and thus become entitled to receive dividends, vote at elections and enjoy all the privileges of ownership, it would be inequitable to allow him to refuse the responsibilities of a stockholder."

In Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 828, 24 L. ed. 818, the court said: "So in Holyoke Bank v. Burnham, 11 Cush. 183, it was decided that a transfer of stock on the books of the bank, intended merely to be held as collateral security makes the holder liable for

It is important to observe that the legal right to vote, belonging to the legal holder of shares, may often be restricted by his equitable obligations to third persons. Thus, a shareholder who has made a complete sale or assignment of his interest in shares, has no right, as against assignee, to vote upon them without the consent of the assignee, although a regular transfer may not have been executed on the company's books. McHenry v. Jewett, 20 Hun, 453.

The right of a trustee to vote upon shares held in trust for other parties depends upon the terms of the trust. A shareholder may transfer his shares to nominees having no real ownership, for the purpose of enabling them to vote at the company's meetings, unless the charter or articles of association of the company restrict the right to vote to such persons as are the beneficial owners of their shares. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 483.

In State v. Hunton, 28 Vt. 595, it was held that a nonresident shareholder could not parcel out his shares among his friends so as to enable them to vote, as this would be in violation of a statute providing that no stockholder residing out of the State should be entitled to vote.

Where a certain amount of corporate stock is held jointly by two of its stockholders, subject to certain equities, the company is required by its officers to issue scrip for said stock to such stockholders; and in an election for trustees of the company, such stockholders, notwithstanding an appeal from such judgment by one of them is pending and undetermined as to the manner of voting, may properly be rejected at the election. Re Pioneer Paper Co. 86 How. Pr. 111.

Directors, how chosen.

The general rule of corporations having a capital stock requires that the directors be chosen from the body of the stockholders. Eligibility to office is governed by the amount of stock held. The majority of the board must be citizens; and the qualifications of the directors, in many respects, is usually determined by statutory enactment or charter recitals. In the absence of these the corporation may prescribe the conditions by resolution or 12 L. R. A.

formal by-law. The election of an unqualified person to a corporate office is merely voidable and not void. People v. Albany & S. R. Co. 55 Barb. 344. See also Cook, Stock and Stockholders, § 680.

Surprise and fraud on the part of the electors is ground for avoiding an election. This principle is asserted in many cases. Rex v. Gaborian, 11 East, 77; Grant, Corp. 204; People v. Peck, 11 Wend. 611; Re Pioneer Paper Co. 86 How. Pr. 103.

It is a law of joint-stock corporations that a majority of the stockholders in interest shall control any election of officers of the company, and in its management.

A court of equity has no power to restrain a public officer, or an officer duly elected or appointed by a corporation, from performing the general, ordinary and proper duties of his office. People v. Albany & S. R. Co. supra.

Directors de facto in contemplation of law, are regarded directors de jure, and their official acts, within the scope of the authority apparently conferred, bind the corporation. Rockville W. Turnp. R. Co. v. Van Ness, 2 Cranch, C. C. 449; Bills v. North Carolina D. & D. Inst. 68 N. C. 423.

A Vermont case holds that the pledgee of stock is not regarded as the owner, to the extent, at least, of entitling him to notice of a stockholders' meeting. McDaniels v. Flower Brook Mfg. Co. 23 Vt. 274.

In corporations aggregate, the principle of an election is a majority, unless otherwise specified. Horton v. Baptist Church Soc. 34 Vt. 316; State v. Wilmington City Council, 3 Harr. (Del.) 294. But after an election has been properly proposed, whoever has a majority of those who vote, the assembly being sufficient, is elected, although the majority of the entire assembly wholly abstain from voting. Oldknow v. Wainwright, 3 Burr. 1017. And see Rex v. Miller, 6 T. R. 288; Booker v. Young, 13 Gratt. 303; Buell v. Buckingham, 18 Iowa, 234; Everett v. Smith, 22 Minn. 53. But see Com. v. Wickensham, 66 Pa. 184.

An adjournment during the process of balloting will not invalidate the election of a board of directors. Penobscot & K. R. Co. v. Dunn, 20 Me. 567. And see Re Chenango County Mut. Ins. Co. 19 Wend. 535; Boone, Corp. § 69.

the bank debts. It was said that the creditor was to be considered the absolute owner, and that his arrangement with his debtor cannot change the character of the ownership."

In Magruder v. Colston, 44 Md. 849, where it was held that the pledgee whose transfer was recorded was liable as a stockholder, the court said: "Stockholders are those who appear on the books of the bank as owners of shares, and who are entitled to manage its affairs, and they can only throw off the liabilities incident to that relation by transferring the stock."

That the word "stockholder," as used by the Legislature, was, in the absence of any qualification of its meaning, understood by the Legislature to be sufficient to embrace a pledgee with a legal title to the stock because of a transfer on the books, is clear from the provisions of section 2988, Comp. Laws, expressly declaring that the holding of stock by a pledgee shall not render the holder a stockholder, within the meaning of that section rendering stockholders liable for debts of the corporation. It is significant that in section 2981, prescribing the qualification of a voter, and declaring that he must be a bona fide stockholder, no such limitation of the meaning of the word "stockholder" is to be found. There are numerous cases in which it is said that a pledgee is a stockholder, and entitled to vote when he appears to be a stockholder on the books of the corporation.

In Franklin Bank v. Commercial Bank, 36 Ohio St. 350, plaintiff loaned to one Foote, the president of defendant, a sum of money, and received as security a pledge of the capital stock of defendant owned by such president. Defendant having refused to transfer the shares on its books, plaintiff sued for the conversion of the stock. The court held that he could not recover, on the principle that one corporation will not be allowed to own stock in another corporation in the absence of statutory authority. Said the court: "Were this not so, one corporation, by buying up the majority of the shares of the stock of another, could take the entire management of its business, however foreign such business might be to that which the corporation so purchasing such shares was created to carry on. . . . Nor would this result follow any the less certainly, if the shares of stock were received in pledge only to secure the payment of a debt, provided the shares were transferred on the books of the company to the name of the pledgee. A person in whose name the stock of the corporation stands on the books of the corporation is as to the corporation a stockholder, and has the right to vote upon the stock. . . . Hence if the plaintiff appeared upon the books of the defendant as the transferee or owner of the two hundred shares of stock represented by the certificate to Foote, it would have the right to vote upon the stock at all meetings of the stockholders of the defendant; and it would be only necessary for it to procure in pledge, as security for money loaned, a majority of the shares of the capital stock of the Commercial Bank [defendant in the case] in order to obtain full control of its affairs and take charge of its banking operations. . . . It therefore follows that the refusal of the defendant to permit the transfer upon its books to the plaintiff of the two hundred shares of its stock violated no right of the plaintiff, and consequently created no liability on the part of the defendant. Such refusal did not amount to a conversion of the stock. Its action in refusing to transfer was but the denial of any right by the plaintiff to be placed in a position to interfere and participate in the control and management of its internal affairs."

In Pool v. West Point B. & O. Assn., 30 Fed. Rep. 518, Judge Brewer says: "The stock was assigned as collateral for moneys advanced by B. D. Brown. It was duly transferred on the books of the company, so that they unquestionably have all the rights of stockholders."

In State v. Ferris, 42 Conn. 560, a bankrupt in whose name stock stood on the books of the company was adjudged entitled to the right to vote the stock after the title to the stock had passed to the assignee in bankruptcy under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act. The court observed: "It has been repeatedly held by this court that the books and records of a corporation determine who are its stockholders for the time being, and who have the right to vote on the stock, although the same may have been sold or pledged as collateral security. In such cases the party who appears to be the owner by the books of the corporation has the right to be treated as a stockholder, and to vote whatever stock stands in his name." See also People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 378; State v. Pettineli, 10 Nev. 141.

Mr. Colebrooke, in his work on Collateral Securities, says: "In the absence of restrictive statutes, the pledgee of certificates of stock indorsed and transferred on the books of the company has a right to vote at its meetings. His name appearing as stockholder on the records, he becomes for all purposes a stockholder. The right to vote is an incident of the pledge, and according to the presumed intention of the parties." Section 288.

In Vail v. Hamilton, 85 N. Y. 458, the action was brought to set aside a mortgage on corporate property, on the ground that it was void because two thirds of the stockholders had not assented to it. Certain of the stock stood in the name of the pledgee on the books of the corporation. The assent of such stock was essential to the validity of the mortgage. The pledgee did not give such assent, and the court adjudged the mortgage void on the ground, among others, that the pledgee was, as to that particular stock, a stockholder, and his assent was necessary because without it there was not the assent of the requisite two thirds. The court said: "It is true that the shares were transferred to Conklin as collateral security, but the certificate was absolute in its terms, and he was described therein as owner. He so appeared upon the proper books of the corporation. Under such a title, he had power to render the security available by sale to satisfy the debt on default of payment, and until the debt was satisfied he was the one interested in protecting the property represented by the shares from diversion by liens or preferences improperly created. The company had a right of redemption, and so had an equitable interest in the stock; but upon defendant's theory they could, without redemption, overreach the legal title by creating a mortgage which, when enforced, would extinguish it, and until that event deprive it of value. Conklin had a clear interest in that matter. Except as limited by statute, no stockholder by any title could have more or greater rights, or be subjected to other liabilities. He is relieved by statute from personal liability."

This, as we have already seen, is the case in this State. "He would be otherwise bound for the debts of the corporation, for a creditor need in general look only for the legal title. For the same reason he had a right to vote; his character upon the books of the bank would be conclusive upon the inspectors; and whether section 17 of the Act of 1848, supra, could, under any circumstances, be so construed as to deprive one with such a title from voting, it is not necessary to inquire, for the question does not arise; but it is clear that, except for the permission given in that section, even a pledgor could not vote. It has no application to an assent required to be given in writing to a specific act of the corporation, and which, without qualification, the Statute requires to be given by a stockholder. Such we have no doubt was the character of Conklin as to the 500 shares in question at the time of the execution of the mortgage. Including these shares as part of the stock to be represented, the assent required by statute was not given and the mortgage is of no validity."

In Hopkin v. Buffum, 9 R. I. 518, the court said: "The object of the stock-book, and of requiring transfers of stock to be recorded by the corporation, is for the protection of the corporation, to enable it to know who are its members, who are entitled to dividends, and for no purpose is it more important than to enable it to know who are entitled to vote in case of an election." The language of the court in Re St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., 44 N. J. L. 529, is equally emphatic on the proposition that the record determines the question who are stockholders in their dealings with the corporation, which embrace the payment and receipt of dividends, and the voting at stockholders' meeting for directors and for other purposes; although on application to a court of equity the stockholders might be compelled to give a proxy to another or to vote as such other should direct. Said the court: "The general rule is that the books of the corporation are the evidence of the persons who are entitled to the rights and privileges of stockholders in the management of the affairs of the corporation. With the single exception that stock really belonging to the corporation cannot, at any election for its directors, be voted upon, directly or indirectly [citing cases], the books of the corporation are the only evidence of who are the stockholders, and as such are entitled to vote at elections. Downing v. Potts, 28 N. J. L. 66. Neither the inspectors nor stockholders can dispute the 12 L. R. A.

In Pender v. Lushington, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 70, the articles of association provided that every member should be entitled to one vote for every ten shares, but should not be entitled to more than one hundred votes in all, and that no member should vote at any general meeting unless he had been possessed of his shares for three months previously thereto. It was held that the register of stockholders was the only evidence by which the right to vote could be ascertained, and that no vote of shareholders appearing on the register, and properly qualified, should be rejected on the ground that their shares had been transferred to them by other shareholders, for the purpose of increasing their own voting power, or with an object alleged to be adverse to the interests of the company, or on the ground that the holders were not beneficial owners of the stock. So, also, it is held that a person has a right to vote on stock standing in his own name as trustee for another, or on stock which he has pledged or hypothecated, if it be in his own name on the company's books; and that inspectors of the election, in determining the qualifications of voters, have no authority to inquire whether the stockholder who appears by the books to be a stockholder is or not the real owner of the stock standing in his name. They must take the company's books as conclusive evidence of the qualification to vote. To same effect are Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 282; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 170, 488; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 29, 27 L. ed. 359, 368.

In State v. Smith, 15 Or. 98 (on rehearing, Id. 122), it was held that the pledgee, who had secured a transfer to himself of the stock on the books of the corporation under the authority of the express language of the assignment of the stock, empowering the pledgee to transfer the stock to his own name on the books, was, nevertheless, not entitled to vote the stock. But the reason for the decision has no application in this jurisdiction. The court held that the power to make the transfer on the books, although unlimited, although without condition as to the time when it might be exercised, could not lawfully be exerted until the pledgee had destroyed the equity of the pledgor by foreclosure. This decision is clearly opposed to that of the court in Nicolet Nat. Bank v. City Bank, 38 Minn. 85, where the court affirmed a judgment against the defendant for conversion of stock, because it had refused to transfer the same upon its corporate books to the name of a pledgee thereof before foreclosure of the pledge, and while still a mere pledgee. This case recognizes the absolute right of the pledgee to such a transfer. Said the court: "Although the assignment to the plaintiff was for the purpose of collateral security, the plaintiff was entitled to have the same entered on the books of the bank." To same effect, Dayton Nat. Bank v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 37 Ohio St. 215.

The right of the pledgee to insist upon a transfer upon the books at once is recognized by numerous cases. Rich v. Boyce, 89 Md. 814; Hubbell v. Drexel, 11 Fed. Rep. 115-118; Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 272; and dissenting opinion of Lord, Ch. J., in State v. Smith, 15 Or. 122, which accords with our views.

But our Statute settles the question. It in express terms declares that a transfer of stock shall not be valid except between the parties, unless the transfer is entered upon the corporate books. Section 2915, Comp. Laws. Under such a Statute, the condition of a pledgee with an unrecorded transfer would be similar to that of a mortgagee whose real or chattel mortgage should not be recorded or filed. Nay, his situation would be worse. A mortgagee's lien in such a case cannot be defeated by the levy of an attachment without notice. But a creditor of a pledgor of stock, who attaches the same in ignorance of a transfer thereof, no transfer on the books having been made, secures a lien which is superior to the interest of the pledgee, and his paramount lien cannot be defeated by subsequent notice of the transfer. Re Murphy, 51 Wis. 519; Flake v. Carr, 20 Me. 801; Skooshogan v. Outler, 49 Me. 815; Nagle v. Pacific Wharf Co. 20 Cal. 529; Weston v. Bear River & A. W. Min. Co. 5 Cal. 186; Strout v. Natima Water & Min. Co. 9 Cal. 78; Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 878; Sabin v. Woodstock Bank, 21 Vt. 353; Cheever v. Meyer, 52 Vt. 66; People's Bank v. Gridley 9 Ill. 457; Northrop v. Newton & B. Turnp. Co. 8 Conn. 549; Pinkerton v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 42 N. H. 463; Ft. Madison Lumber Co. v. Batavian Bank, 71 Iowa, 270; Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25; Sibley v. Quinsigamond Nat. Bank, 133 Mass. 515; Second Nat. Bank v. Williston, 138 Mass. 244; People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 878.

To say, in the light of this Statute and its construction, that a power vested in the pledgee to record the transfer was intended by the pledgor not for the purpose of conferring on the pledgee power to protect himself while a pledgee by making such record, is downright nonsense. Said the court in Rich v. Boyce, 89 Md. 814: "So far from the transfer of stock to the appellee's own name being a wrongful conversion, it was the exercise of an undoubted right conferred upon them by the appellant. Without such right, the pledge would have been doubtful security, as the stock would have been liable to execution or attachment by any creditor of the appellant." To same effect, Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 288.

But where the pledgor not only authorizes a record of the transfer to be made by the pledgee, such record being essential to the latter's protection, but makes the transfer on the books himself, as in the case at bar, by surrendering his old certificates and issuing directly to the pledgee new certificates, signed by the pledgor himself as president of the corporation, no room is left for the inquiry whether the pledgee had authority to make the transfer upon the corporate books, as in the Oregon case. In Day v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 310, the court held that a pledgee was justified in procuring new certificates to be issued to himself in place of stock assigned to him in blank, and that this act did not constitute a conversion of the stock. See also Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, §§ 288, 323.

The provision of the Statute that a stockholder, to be entitled to vote, must be a bona fide stockholder, and have stock in his own name on the books, at least ten days prior to the election, must be read and interpreted in the light, not only of the decisions holding that a pledgee is a stockholder, but also in connection with the legislation which, under the decisions and by its terms, makes it necessary for a pledgee to secure a transfer on the books to protect himself against the creditors of his pledgor. Knowing that stock is frequently pledged, and that the pledgee would secure a transfer on the books to protect himself, it must be assumed that the Legislature intended he should be regarded as a stockholder with power to vote, for it has disqualified his pledgor to vote the stock after transfer; and it would be unjustifiable to impute to the law-making power a deliberate design frequently to leave a majority of the stock of a corporation without power to act, and thus render it impossible to hold a stockholders' meeting for any purpose. Unlike the doctrine of the common law, which allows any minority of the stockholders, however small, to constitute a quorum (1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 476), our Statute requires a vote of stockholders representing a majority of the subscribed capital stock (§ 2925, Comp. Laws) to elect directors. Moreover, the provision that the pledgor, and not the pledgee, should be liable for the debts of the corporation, to the extent of a stockholder's liability clearly indicates that it was intended that the latter should have the right to make a transfer on the books, for without such transfer he is never liable. Anderson v. Philadelphia Warehouse Co. 111 U. S. 479, 28 L. ed. 478.

There is a class of cases in which the books are not conclusive of the right of the person to vote who appears upon the books to be a stockholder. The law will not allow the transfer upon corporate books to cover up the incapacity of the real owner to vote upon the stock. No corporation, in the absence of statutory permission, has any right to vote its own stock. Such stock having no vote, the colorable transfer of it upon the books will not give the person in whose name it stands authority to vote it. See Ex parte Holmes, 5 Cow. 426; American E. Frog Co. v. Haven, 101 Mass. 398. But there is a marked difference between such a case and the case of a pledgee who in good faith holds the legal title to the stock. The rights of the pledgor are in equity. He may, in a proper case, compel the pledgee to give him a proxy by a bill in equity. Schofield v. Union Bank, 2 Cranch. C. C. 115; Vouell v. Thompson, 3 Cranch. C. C. 428; McHenry v. Jewett, 90 N. Y. 58; Hoppin v. Buffum, 9 R. I. 513.

The fact that such suits have been instituted indicates the necessity for them. A pledgor who has a legal right to vote stock, notwithstanding it has been transferred on the corporate books, need not resort to equity for a proxy. Said the court, in the last case cited: "If the real owner wishes to have his name, or the true state of facts, appear on the books, he has his remedy in equity to compel a proper transfer, or to compel the pledgee to give a proxy, as was done in the case of Vowell v. Thompson, 8 Cranch, U. S. 428." The pledgee sustains a relation to the corporation. This is determined by the record. In dealings with the corporation, his status as a stockholder is fixed by the books. "As between a corporator and the corporation, the records of the corporation, or its stock-book, as it is called, is the evidence of their relation. Meetings of the stockholders, elections and dividends, etc., are regulated by this record." Bank of Commerce's App. 78 Pa. 59.

If the equities and contract relations between different persons claiming the right to vote the same stock are to be considered in determining the question of the right to vote, few elections would be certain, and the courts would often be called upon to investigate a multitude of collateral issues in determining who had been elected directors, or whether any other business transacted at a stockholders' meeting had the support of the requisite amount of stock. Said the court, in Hoppin v. Buffum, 9 R. I. 518: "Upon any other rule, it could never be known who were entitled to vote until the courts had decided the dispute. The corporation or its officers would have to decide it for the time, and it would leave the election in uncertainty."

The record fixes the status of a person as a stockholder; and another having an equitable right to wield the power of a stockholder, as between himself and the one who has the legal right, must enforce that equitable right by the decree of a court, before he can be recognized as a stockholder in his relations with the corporation. The legal title to the stock determines the right to vote, and the courts, on quo warranto or on summary proceedings under the Statute, cannot regard and enforce a merely equitable right. It is true that under the Statute the court is authorized to award broader relief than on quo warranto. It may declare a different set of directors elected, but the proceeding in its essential nature is a proceeding at law to determine who had the legal right to vote as stockholders at a stockholders' meeting for directors or for other purposes. That the legal title to stock hypothecated and transferred to the creditor on the books is in the creditor so far as dealings with the corporation are concerned is elementary. Cecil Nat. Bank v. Watontown Bank, 105 U. S. 317, 26 L. ed. 1089; Wilson v. Little, 2 N. Y. 448; Ang. & A. Corp. § 580; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 328, 24 L. ed. 818; Germania Nat. Bank of New Orleans v. Case, 99 U. S. 628, 25 L. ed. 448; Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 282. It is not strictly accurate to speak of the creditor holding hypothecated stock transferred on the corporate books as a mere pledgee. His relation to the debtor and to the corporation may be more accurately described. He is a holder of the legal title to stock as collateral security. The debtor has a general right to the return of his property and its title, on payment of his obligation. By his own voluntary act, the debtor has conferred upon the creditor all the rights of a stockholder by authorizing him to transfer the stock on the corporate books. In this case the debtor himself made the transfer by canceling his certificates, and issuing in their place others directly to the creditors' agent, signed by himself as president of the corporation. We are clearly of the opinion that Faulkner, and not Edwards, was entitled to vote the 546 shares of stock in question. The agreement between Hill and Edwards that the stock should be placed in the name of such person as Hill should designate, for the purpose of giving Hill control of the corporation, adds nothing to his legal rights, but it would be an important element in the case were Edwards here invoking equity to compel Hill to give him a proxy. The latter could use it as a defense to an application for such relief. If however, as is contended by Mr. Edwards, Hill agreed to leave him in control of the corporation, a resort to equity to compel the giving of a proxy would be his proper remedy. Such issues cannot be tried at every election, nor is it the policy of the law that they should be. It would, indeed, be a startling doctrine that the legality of business transacted at stockholders' meetings should be subject to the ultimate decision of complicated questions arising between different claimants of the same stock. If Faulkner voted this stock at the meeting, it is our duty, under the Statute, to declare the other set of directors elected. Ex parte Deadloft, 1 Wend. 98; Re Barker, 6 Wend. 509. Re St. Lawrence Steamboat Co. 44 N. J. L. 529; Re Cape May & D. B. N. Co. 51 N. J. L. 78.

Before discussing this, however, we should dispose of a further question relating to the qualification of Faulkner to vote this stock. The Statute declares that a stockholder must be a bona fide stockholder to entitle him to vote. This phrase, "bona fide," in this connection is used in contradistinction to "bad faith." In Re St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., supra, the Statute required a person to be a bona fide stockholder to be eligible to the office of director. The court said, in construing this Statute: "A stockholder may have purchased stock with a view of becoming a director, or have obtained it by gift, or he may hold it upon a trust, and be qualified to be a director. If the stock was legally issued, and was not the property of the corporation, and the legal title is in him, he is prima facie capable of being a director, and his right to be a director, in virtue of his legal title to such stock, can be impeached only by showing that title was put in him colorably, with a view to qualify him to be a director for some dishonest purpose, in furtherance of some fraudulent scheme touching the organization or control of the company, or to carry into effect some fraudulent arrangement with the company." But we do not think that Faulkner voted this stock for the persons who claim to be elected as directors. It is undisputed that he did not vote the stock at the meeting over which Mr. Edwards presided. At the hour named for the meeting Edwards assumed to act as chairman, and directed a Mr. Flint to act as secretary. This was without objection. The call was then read. Next Edwards stated that the object of the meeting was to elect directors for the ensuing year. Ballot-boxes were then prepared, and nominations for directors were made by Edwards and by Mr. Faulkner. After that, some other routine business was transacted, and then an adjournment was taken, on motion of Mr. Faulkner, until afternoon. When the meeting was reopened, after the adjournment, Faulkner moved to reconsider all that had been done, on the ground that the president of the corporation had no right to act as chairman of the stockholders' meeting without election, and that he had not been elected or chosen chairman. In a word, Faulkner claimed that the meeting had not been properly organized. We think his claim came too late. He had acquiesced in the organization and had participated in the business of the meeting. He had even recognized, by making nominations for directors, that at that meeting as so organized, the candidates for directors should be voted for. Failing in his efforts to reorganize the meeting, he withdrew from it without voting, or offering to vote, his stock for directors. It is true that Edwards had notified him that he would not be permitted to vote his stock for directors. But this would not dispense with affirmative action on his part. His secret intention to vote for certain persons for directors, without expressing that intention in a legal way, would not elect anyone to office. It is true that Edwards might, and probably would, have refused to receive the ballot which he might have offered. But it was not in the power of Edwards, or of anyone else, to prevent his voting at that meeting. There was therefore no reason for his withdrawing. It was his duty to remain at the stockholders' meeting as organized, and vote his stock at that meeting. This he did not do, and we are of opinion that voting the stock at another meeting, which he held with others in the same room, at the same time, was of no effect. A minority must have a right to insist that, after a meeting is organized, the majority shall not withdraw from it, and organize another meeting, at which the minority must appear or lose their rights. Once concede the right, and there is no limit to the number of wrecked meetings which may, at the caprice of a majority, precede the transaction of any business. Suppose the vote of two thirds of the stock voted is required to carry a measure under the law or the by-laws of the corporation. Stockholders having more than one third of the stock present can vote it down. Can a majority, constituting less than two thirds, withdraw from an organized meeting, and thus compel the minority to follow them, or lose their right to defeat the measure? We believe it would be unwise, and unjust as well, to sanction such a rule. It is not essential to the protection of the majority who have the right to vote at the meeting as organized. On the other hand, the contrary rule is necessary for the protection of the minority. It is true that mere irregularities in conducting a meeting will not vitiate an election, but when a meeting is once organized it is not a mere irregularity to withdraw from it, and start a new one. The persons voted for at the second meeting cannot be adjudged to have been elected directors, without deciding both that the second meeting was valid and that the first was illegal. "The acts of a majority are not binding upon the company, unless the proceedings are conducted regularly, and in accordance with general usage, or in the manner prescribed by the charter and by-laws of the company." 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 487 and cases. See Re Long Island R. Co. 19 Wend. 87. To elect directors, they must receive the vote of a majority of the subscribed capital stock. Comp. Laws, § 2925. This is fatal to the election of the persons voted for at the legal meeting. Only 12 shares were lawfully voted at that meeting. It was therefore error to dismiss the petition. It was the duty of the court, under the Statute, to set aside the old, and order a new, election. Re Long Island R. Co. 19 Wend. 87; Comp. Laws, § 2932.

There remains to be considered the qualification of one of the directors voted for at the pretended meeting by Faulkner. To be a director one must be a holder of stock. § 2926, Id. Shortly before the election Faulkner transferred to B. F. Spaulding 10 of the 556 shares held by him, and on the day of election Spaulding demanded a transfer on the books. This request was refused. We do not think that he was eligible to the office of director. He did not appear to be a stockholder upon the books of the corporation. If he was entitled to have his transfer recorded, the corporation would be liable for its refusal, and he could recover the full value of his stock. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 217, and cases cited. Or he might compel a transfer by an application to a court of equity. Id. § 220, and cases cited. But until such transfer is made he is not, under our Statute, a stockholder in his relations with the corporation. Our Statute in express terms declares, as we have already seen, that a transfer of stock, not entered upon the corporate books, shall not be valid for any purpose, except as between the parties. Comp. Laws, § 2915. If it is effectual to qualify the transferee for the office of director, it is valid for a very important purpose. We may not disregard the imperative provision of this law, nor can we shut our eyes to its very obvious policy. It would be as unfortunate, and as fruitful of confusion and litigation, to have the eligibility of a person for the office of director left in doubt at a stockholders' meeting to elect directors, as to have left in uncertainty the qualification of a person to vote as a stockholder for a director at that meeting. Under a statute couched in the same language, it has been held that the assignor of stock not transferred on the corporate books, and not the assignee thereof, has the right to vote the stock at a meeting to elect directors. People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 878; State v. Pettineli, 10 Nev. 141. See also 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 488; State v. Ferris, 42 Conn. 560.

The decisions in New Jersey and Oregon, in Re St. Lawrence Steamboat Co., 44 N. J. L. 529, and State v. Smith, 15 Or. 98, are not of controlling force here, because our Statute, by both its terms and its manifest spirit, compels the adoption of a different doctrine. A person who desires to be recognized as a stockholder, for the purpose of voting, of being a director, of suing for dividends, must secure such a standing by recording his transfer on the corporate books. Nor will the assignee be without remedy. The law affords him the two remedies referred to against the corporation for an unwarranted refusal to make the transfer; and he may, by a resort to a court of equity, compel his transferor to give him a proxy after he has been unjustifiably deprived of his right to have his name entered upon the books of the corporation as a stockholder. Moreover, he can always insist on a transfer as a condition precedent to his purchase or loan on the security of the stock. Business prudence would prompt this caution. In cases where the corporation has a lien on the shares of its stockholders, the purchaser, without a transfer on the books, takes subject to the lien, and the corporation may refuse to record the transfer until the lien is discharged. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 208. By insisting on a transfer upon the books before he pays his money, the purchaser will secure his stock free from such lien, as the act of the corporation in making such transfer would be a waiver of the lien. Id. § 208; Cecil Nat. Bank v. Watontown Bank, 105 U. S. 217, 26 L. ed. 1039.

In Helm v. Swiggett, 12 Ind. 194, it was held that a corporation, whose charter gave it a lien upon the stock of a stockholder for a debt owing to the corporation, had no lien for a debt of the assignee of stock on stock assigned, but not transferred on the books, the court saying: "Ownership simply of a certificate of stock in the bank did not constitute the owner of it a stockholder. It required a transfer of the stock to him upon the books of the bank." Referring to the provision requiring a transfer upon the books, Mr. Morawetz says: "It follows, therefore, that a transfer upon the books is essential to a novation of the contract of membership, where there is a provision of this description. An assignment of shares, although valid as between assignor and assignee, would not affect their legal relationship to the company until after a transfer was entered upon the books," etc. Vol. 1, § 170.

Under our Statute, no person can claim to be a stockholder, in his dealings with the corporation, until his name appears in some way as stockholder on the corporate books; and as the Statute requires a person to be a stockholder, not stock-owner, to entitle him to be a director, we are clear that Spaulding was not eligible to that office. "The directors of a corporation are generally required to be shareholders by express provisions of the company's charter or articles of association. A person is a shareholder, within the meaning of a provision of this description, if he holds shares on the books of the company, but not if he is merely the holder of the certificate. It has been held that the transferee on the books is eligible, although he is not the real owner of the shares, and the transfer was executed for the sole purpose of making him a director. A different rule might apply where the Statute expressly requires the directors to be the owners of shares." Id. § 506. Had Spaulding appeared as a stockholder on the corporate books, he would have been qualified to hold the office of director, although the transfer had been made to him for the sole purpose of so qualifying him. As he did not so appear, he was not eligible to that office.

It was urged that as Faulkner subsequently to the issue of the stock had indorsed it in blank, and left it in the possession of Hill, that he (Faulkner) had ceased to be a stockholder, and therefore had no right to vote the stock or be a director. Under our Statute providing that an unrecorded transfer of stock shall not be valid for any purpose except between the parties, we are clearly of the opinion, as we have already stated in another connection, that until a transfer should be made on the books Faulkner would continue to be a stockholder, for the purpose of voting the stock or of being eligible to the office of director. People v. Robinson, 64 Cal. 373; State v. Pettineli, 10 Nev. 141; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 488; State v. Ferris, 42 Conn. 580.

There are certain findings of fact which we are unable to discover any evidence in the record to sustain. The view the trial court took of the law may, however, explain why they are embodied in the case. The court finds that Hill, in electing directors, was not to put in men unsatisfactory to Edwards. Mr. Faulkner, on cross-examination by Mr. Edwards himself, stated that Edwards said to Hill that Hill was to have a majority of the directors. Mr. Edwards then remarked: "Satisfactory to me, of course?" To this the answer was: "He was to pick his own men." This is all the evidence on the point. Mr. Edwards did not testify in the case. It is true that the record seems to show that Hill was not to put in men who were enemies of Edwards, but this will not justify a finding that the majority of the directors were to be satisfactory to Edwards. Many persons who were not his enemies might nevertheless be unsatisfactory to him. The most that it can be claimed that the evidence discloses is that the question as to what men the majority of the board should be composed of was to depend upon a fact not to be determined by Hill or Edwards finally, but by the courts; whereas, the finding would make Edwards the sole and final arbiter of the question. This would be repugnant to the spirit of the arrangement which was to prevent Edwards from dealing with the corporation and its assets to the prejudice of Hill. Prior to this time Hill had held, as collateral for this same debt, stock in another corporation controlled by Edwards. Hill discovered that the organization of this corporation had been suffered to lapse; that his stock had therefore become worthless; and that Edwards had formed a new corporation. This stock had not been transferred on the books of the corporation, and Edwards, therefore, had full control of it, and by means of it had had complete control over the corporation. When Edwards proposed to give Hill stock in the new company as security, Hill said: "What good would that be if you form a third company?" To this Edwards replied that, to prevent this, Hill could have the stock put in his own name, and have absolute control, and then he would be safe, and a third company could not be started. Certainly, Mr. Hill would have no control whatever if Mr. Edwards were allowed arbitrarily to pronounce unsatisfactory every director for whom Mr. Hill or his representative should vote this stock. The effect would be that Mr. Hill would have control only on condition that he suffered Mr. Edwards to control him in exercising that control. Other findings it is not important to refer to, as a new election must be had.

The third conclusion of law is unwarranted. It states that Faulkner held this stock subject to the joint order of Hill and Edwards. Having made a transfer of the stock upon the records by issuing new shares directly to Faulkner, Edwards, as pledgor, had no control over the stock without paying his debt. He could not control Faulkner in voting it without appealing to a court of equity under peculiar circumstances creating an equity in his behalf. Such circumstances are not shown by this record to exist in this case. This he did not do, and it was error to hold that he could, at a stockholders' meeting, exercise any control over the stock or over Faulkner, who held it.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and that court is directed to render judgment setting aside as illegal the election of A. W. Edwards, H. O. Plumley, M. R. Flint, Alexander Griggs and William A. Stevens, as directors, and ordering a new election to be had as required by the Statute. The old directors will hold their office until their successors are elected and qualified. § 2924, Comp. Laws. It will be so ordered.

BANK OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
Appt.

(....N. Y....)

1. Payment of checks stolen from the depositor, without negligence on his part, by his clerk, who forged the indorsements of the payees' names, constitutes no defense to the bank against an action by the depositor for his deposit, especially where the bank made no inquiry as to the genuineness of the indorsements but relied upon the responsibility of the persons presenting the checks for payment.

2. A depositor has the right to assume when checks are returned to him by the bank

NOTE.—Relation between bank and depositor.

The relations and relative obligations arising between a bank and its depositing customers are in general simply those of debtor and creditor. This position is well recognized. Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28; Ettna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 614; Boydén v. Bank of Cape Fear, 65 N. C. 18; Allen v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 5 Jones & S. 187, 59 N. Y. 12; Buchanan Farm Oil Co. v. Woodman, 1 Hun, 639, 4 Thomp. & C. 193.

The understanding between the parties is, that the money shall remain with the banker and under his control until the customer, by his check, or in some other way, calls for its repayment; and the banker is not in default, and no action will lie, until payment has been demanded. Downes v. Charlestown Phoenix Bank, 6 Hill, 297; Oddie v. National City Bank, 45 N. Y. 735, 6 Am. Rep. 160; Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 397.

It is not the case of a bailment unless the deposit is special. Wray v. Tuskegee Ins. Co., 34 Ala. 53; Egerton v. Fulton Nat. Bank, 43 How. Pr. 216; Bank of Northern Liberties v. Jones, 43 Pa. 583.

In the case of a general depositor, if the money, checks or bills deposited are stolen, lost or destroyed, or become of no value, the bank sustains the loss, and the depositor is still a creditor of the bank (Re Franklin Bank, 1 Paige, 249, 2 L. ed. 635), and has no valid claim to a priority of payment over bill-holders or other creditors. Re Franklin Bank, supra. And see Ellis v. Linck, 3 Ohio St. 66.

It is elementary law that a bank is bound to exhibit its books to a depositor, on proper occasions, and the officers having charge of them are quo ad hoc, the agents of both parties. Union Bank v. Knapp, 3 Pick. 93.

The theory that a party who makes and issues commercial paper, properly and carefully drawn, to express the liability which he intends to assume, is chargeable with negligence on account of the criminal act of another in altering it after its issue, would render him a warrantor against such acts, and is repugnant to justice and reason. Crawford v. West Side Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 253, 100 N. Y. 50.

Pass-book no evidence of right to draw money.

A savings bank seeks to justify the payment by it of a depositor's money to a stranger upon the ground that such payment was made to a person having possession of the depositor's pass-book. Such a pass-book is not negotiable paper, and its possession constitutes in itself no evidence of a right to draw money thereon. It merely imports a liability of the bank to the depositor for the moneys deposited, and an agreement to repay them at such time and in such manner as he shall direct. This contract is implied from the nature and objects of the transaction occurring between the parties. Crawford v. West Side Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 253, 100 N. Y. 51.

The depositor may by special contract authorize payments to be made in some other manner than by his direction, but, in order to make such payments a protection to the bank, it is necessary for it to show some special agreement with the customer, authorizing such a mode of payment. Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 301, 101 N. Y. 53.

The contract between a bank and its depositor is the plain one of debtor and creditor. It has no element of trust; its character is in no way fiduciary. Consequently, the transactions of a bank with its depositors are governed exactly by the same rules as control ordinary contract relations. Thompson that it has ascertained the genuineness of indorsements thereon.

3. A clerk's knowledge of his own wrong in forging checks and fabricating false papers to conceal his crime cannot be imputed to his principal.

4. A negotiable note made payable to a fictitious person and negotiated by the maker, which is given the same validity as against the maker and all persons having knowledge of the facts as if payable to bearer, by Rev. Stat., 765, § 5, includes only paper made with knowledge that the payee is fictitious, and does not include paper made by one who supposes the payee to be a real person and which is fraudulently negotiated by a third person without the maker's fault.

5. The fact that the forger of indorsements on checks has made good the amount to the payees constitutes no defense to the bank which has paid out money on the checks in an action by the depositor for his deposit money which is not founded upon the checks where plaintiff has not profited by such payment.

v. Riggs, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 663, 18 L. ed. 704; National Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 897; Phoenix Bank of New York City v. Risley, 111 U. S. 125, 28 L. ed. 374.

The bank is bound to know at its peril the signature of its depositor. As to the filling in or body of the check, it owes no such duty, and it is only called upon to exercise ordinary care. 3 Dan. Neg. Inst. 3d ed. § 1654a; Espy v. First Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 604, 21 L. ed. 947.

While it is true that the relation of a bank and its depositor is one simply of debtor and creditor (Phoenix Bank of New York City v. Risley, 111 U. S. 125, 127, 28 L. ed. 374, 375), and that the depositor is not chargeable with any payments except such as are made in conformity with his orders, it is within common knowledge that the object of a pass-book is to inform the depositor from time to time of the condition of his account as it appears upon the books of the bank, and operates to protect him against the carelessness or fraud of the bank. Leather Manufacturers Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811.

When forged checks have been paid by a bank, charged in the depositor's account, and returned to him, he owes no duty to the bank to so conduct an examination of these vouchers that it will necessarily lead to a discovery of the fraud. At most, all that is required of the depositor is ordinary care, and if this is exercised by him or his agent, the bank cannot justly complain although the forgeries are not discovered until too late to enable it to retrieve its position or make reclamation from the forger. Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209.

Bank deposits.

In National Bank of Commerce v. National Mechanics Bkg. Assn. 55 N. Y. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 222, it was held that a bank is not bound to know the handwriting or genuineness of the filling up of a check drawn upon it, but only the signature of the drawer. So, where a bank had certified a check, which afterward was fraudulently raised, and the bank by mistake paid the raised amount to a bona fide holder, it was held that it could recover back the sum so paid, unless the holder had suffered loss in consequence of the mistake. The court here said: "If the defendant had shown that it had suffered loss in consequence of the mistake committed by the plaintiff, as for instance, if in consequence of the recognition of the check in question, the

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment entered in the New York county clerk's office, upon the report of a referee in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover money alleged to have been deposited by plaintiffs with defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Allen Butler and Adrian H. Joline, for appellant:

It was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to examine the pass-book and vouchers when the same were written up and balanced and returned to them from time to time. This was a duty they owed the defendant.

Morse, Banks and Banking, 8d ed. § 291, and see §§ 472, 473; Dana v. National Bank of the Republic, 183 Mass. 156; Leather Mfrs. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 29 L. ed. 811.

The plaintiffs' negligence in the examination of the pass-book and vouchers is a bar to their right of recovery.

When one of two innocent parties must suffer from the fraud of a third, the loss should fall defendant had paid out money to its fraudulent depositor, then, clearly, to the extent of the loss thus sustained, the plaintiff should be responsible." Louisiana Nat. Bank of New Orleans v. Citizens Bank of Louisiana, 28 La. Ann. 189, 28 Am. Rep. 92, and note.

The bank owes no duty to the holder of a check drawn against it until it has, by its own voluntary act, created one; i. e., by certifying the same, or by charging the drawer with the amount thereof. Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 899.

In Morse on Banking, p. 243, it is said: "The bank has no right to defer the payment with the intention of making or refusing it at a later hour, according as it shall be influenced by subsequent occurrences. If payment is demanded at noon upon a check which the depositor's unincumbered balance at that hour is sufficient to pay in full, it is at once mature and perfect." First Nat. Bank of Northumberland v. McMichael, 106 Pa. 460.

There is abundant authority for the statement that the drawer of a check, made payable to the order of the payee, is not bound by a payment thereof by the bank, upon a forged indorsement of the name of the payee; it is bound before payment to ascertain the genuineness of the indorsement.

A depositor owes no duty to a bank requiring him to examine his pass-book or return checks with a view to the detection of forgeries in the indorsements; he has a right to assume that the bank before paying his checks will ascertain the genuineness of the indorsements. Welsh v. German American Bank, 78 N. Y. 424.

The relation existing between a bank and its depositor is, in a strict sense, that of debtor and creditor; but in discharging its obligation as a debtor, the bank must do so subject to the rules obtaining between principal and agent.

Funds must be paid out in due course of business.

In disbursing the customer's funds, it can pay them only in the usual course of business, and in conformity to his directions. In debiting his account it is not entitled to charge any payments except those made at the time when, to the person whom, and for the amount, authorized by him. Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. 545; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1813.

It receives the depositor's funds upon the implied condition of disbursing them according to his on him who enabled such third party to commit the fraud.

Root v. French, 18 Wend. 570; Horn v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289.

The rule has been applied to transactions by a duly authorized agent, acting in behalf of his principal, and therefore representing him, and by his act and dealings occasioning loss to innocent third parties.

Grinbold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 595; Story, Partn. § 108.

Plaintiffs having been merely careless in their dealings, they are estopped.

Smith v. Mechanics & T. Bank, 6 La. Ann. 610.

The knowledge of Bedell was plaintiffs' knowledge.

Allen v. Coit, 6 Hill, 818.

This case falls directly within the principle applied in New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 84 N. Y. 30, where the doctrine of implied agency arising out of negligence and based on estoppel in pais was enforced.

Cheung Canal Bank v. Bradner, 44 N. Y. 680; Durst v. Burton, 47 N. Y. 167.

Plaintiffs took the risk of intrusting the checks to Bedell, and, having done so, are estopped to question the indorsements.

Cooper v. Meyer, 10 Barn. & C. 468; Coggill v. American Ech. Bank, 1 N. Y. 118.

The several checks which were made payable to the order of persons having no existence were, in legal effect and under the statute of this State, payable to bearer; and the plaintiffs put the checks into circulation under circumstances which render them chargeable with knowledge that the payees were fictitious.

Rev. Stat. pt. 2, chap. 4, title 2, § 5; 1 Rev. Stat. 768, § 5; Plets v. Johnson, 8 Hill, 112; Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 569, 8 T. R. 481; Tatlock v. Harris, 8 T. R. 174; Vere v. Lewis, 8 T. The plaintiffs here are chargeable with knowledge that the payees named therein were non-existent.

If the defendant not only accepted (certified) order, and upon an accounting is liable for all such sums deposited, as it has paid away without receiving valid direction therefor. The bank is from necessity responsible for any omission to discover the original terms and conditions of a check, once properly drawn upon it, because at the time of payment it is the only party interested in protecting its integrity, who has the opportunity of inspection; and it therefore owes the duty to its depositors of guarding the fund intrusted to it from spoliation. This liability arises although an alteration of a material part of his order has been effected, even though it be done so skillfully as to defy detection by examination. Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1600.

Banker must sustain loss when he pays on a forged signature.

The liability of the banker, however, for a loss occasioned by neglect to exercise such vigilance is confined to the maker alone. So far as other parties, through whose hands an altered check passes, are concerned, they have the same opportunity for detecting fraudulent alterations in the body of the check that the banker has, and as to them, after payment, he is responsible only for the genuineness of the maker's signature. Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 N. Y. 230.

The principle stated in White v. Continental Nat. Bank, 64 N. Y. 318; Marine Nat. Bank v. National City Bank, 59 N. Y. 67, and kindred cases, that the drawees of a check or bill are held to a knowledge of the signature only of their correspondents, the drawers, and not for a want of knowledge of the genuineness of the body of the instrument, applies only as between them and such other parties as have equal opportunity of inspection, and equal means for determining the existence of an alteration. Such parties take the paper relying solely upon the reputed responsibility of their transferrers, and the other parties to it, and its apparent genuineness, and they therefore deal in it at their peril. They have no duty to perform in respect to it except that of guarding their own interests, and in buying and transferring it to others they take the risk of loss occurring from fraudulent alterations.

The questions arising on such paper between drawee and drawer, however, always relate to what the one has authorized the other to do. They are 12 L. R. A.

not questions of negligence or of liability of parties upon commercial paper, but are those of authority solely. In this view it has been held when the check of a depositor was fraudulently altered from three pounds to two hundred pounds after issue, and was paid by the bank at the latter amount, that the bank was entitled to charge only three pounds to the depositor. Hall v. Fuller, 5 Barn. & C. 760. Bailey, J., said: If the banker unfortunately pays money belonging to the customer upon an order not genuine, he must suffer, and to justify the payment he must show that the order was genuine, not in the signature only, but in every respect."

The question of negligence cannot arise unless the depositor has, in drawing his check, left blanks unfilled, or by some affirmative act of negligence has facilitated the commission of a fraud by those into whose hands the check may come. Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 268; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1600.

"It has been said: Whatever loss the bank has sustained it has suffered from its own negligence or want of skill in a matter as to which, in the first instance, it and it only was bound to exercise skill and diligence. To this loss no act of Weisser has contributed. He was guilty of no bad faith. He has violated no duty which he owed to the bank and is in no way responsible (Manhattan Co. v. Lydig, 4 Johns. 377; Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt. 78; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253; Johnson v. Windle, 3 Bing. N. C. 226; Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 N. Y. 230; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287). He had a right to assume that the bank had discharged its own duty to itself (if indeed he was bound to make any assumption upon the subject), and was not bound to conceive it possible that the bank had charged him with money which had not been paid upon his order." Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68.

Where checks forged by the confidential clerk of the depositor were paid by the bank, charged to the depositor in his pass-book, the book balanced, and, with the forged vouchers among others, returned to the clerk, who examined the account at the request of the principal, and reported it correct, and the principal did not discover the forgeries until several months afterwards, when he immediately made them known to the bank, it was held, in an action to recover the balance of the deposit, that the bank could not retain the amount of the forged checks. Weisser v. Denison, supra. See Atlanta Nat. Bank v. Burke, 2 L. R. A. 36, 81 Ga. 597.

but paid in ignorance of the fiction, the plaintiffs are estopped from asserting their want of knowledge against defendant on the same principle which would have estopped them from asserting it against bona fide holders of the checks.

As between plaintiffs and the Bank, Bedell's apparent authority was equivalent to the actual scope of his agency.

Griswold v. Haven, 25 N. Y. 595.

As to ten of the eleven checks payable to the order of existing persons, the evidence shows that the plaintiffs sustained no loss, the amounts having been made good by Bedell to the payees. The defense in regard to these checks set up in the answer was established, and the referee erred in refusing to find accordingly.

Under the present system of pleading and procedure a defendant in an action to enforce a strictly legal right may interpose a defense purely equitable.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal brings here for review a judgment of over $223,000, recovered by the plaintiffs against the defendant, upon a state of facts fully found and stated by the referee in his report, and in regard to which there is little, if any, serious dispute between the parties. The form of the action is for the recovery of a sum of money which it is claimed the defendant undertook, when accepting the plaintiffs' deposits, to pay to them, or upon their order and direction. It has been found, and is admitted on both sides, that on the 7th of April, 1884, the plaintiffs had upon deposit to their credit with the defendant the sum of $14,499.08. That from this date to the close of business on the 3d day of October, 1888, the defendant had and received to and for the use of the plaintiffs various other sums of money, deposited from time to time, between these dates, by the plaintiffs with the defendant, amounting in the aggregate to $6,218,566.71. That between the 7th day of April, 1884, and the close of business on the 3d day of October, 1888, the defendant paid to the order of the plaintiffs, on their checks drawn against the balance above stated and the deposits subsequently made, various sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to $6,080,040.59. This would leave a balance due to the plaintiffs by the defendant of $198,045.50, which, with interest, is the sum that constitutes the subject of this controversy. The defendant alleged in its answer that all moneys deposited with it by the plaintiffs were fully paid upon their order, and by checks drawn upon it by them; and, in order to meet and disprove the plaintiff's claim that there was due to them by the defendant, at the close of business on the 3d day of October, 1888, the sum of $198,045.50, the defendant produced twenty-seven checks, all signed by the plaintiffs and drawn upon the defendant, directing the payment of sums respectively aggregating the total balance above mentioned, and to recover which the plaintiffs brought the action. That the defendant actually paid these checks is not disputed, and the case is thus made to turn upon the question whether they are available to the defendant as lawful vouchers, establishing the fact that the moneys claimed by the plaintiffs were paid out by the defendant upon these checks according to the order and direction of the plaintiffs.

A clear understanding of the question involved requires a brief statement of the facts and circumstances under which these twenty-seven checks were signed by the plaintiffs and presented to and paid by the defendant. The plaintiffs are a well-known law firm in the City of New York, engaged in an extensive business, which, in its organization, had a department known as the "Real Estate Department." In this branch of their business they examined titles for clients who were lenders of money on bond and mortgage, carried out and completed such loans, and occasionally examined titles for clients who were purchasers of real estate. One of the members of the firm had general charge of this department, but the details of the business and the execution of the work were intrusted to subordinates. One James E. Bedell, a lawyer who had been admitted to the bar in the year 1868, and had been in the employ of the plaintiffs since 1873, assisting in the real-estate department, was, in the year 1881, practically put in charge of the work of this department, under the direction of the member of plaintiffs' firm who had the general charge. Bedell was an experienced and capable lawyer. The plaintiffs believed that he was honest and trustworthy, and, prior to the discovery of the very extraordinary crime in connection with these checks, they had no reason whatever to suspect or distrust him. During the period covered by the transactions in question the plaintiffs employed one Dodge, a competent expert book-keeper, who took charge of the plaintiffs' books, and acted as cashier. He kept the account between the plaintiffs and defendant. He filled out all the checks and made all the entries in the check-books, and the checks, when paid by defendant, came to him with the pass-book, which was balanced by the defendant, and the vouchers, including the checks in question, returned with the book, from time to time, at frequent intervals. The course of the business in which the checks in question were issued was substantially as follows: The plaintiff's client, who wished to make a loan through them, furnished the money, which went directly into the plaintiffs' general bank account with the defendant. Against the sum to be loaned, and thus put to the plaintiffs' credit, checks were filled up by Dodge, the cashier, from a written statement made by Bedell, showing the amount required to pay liens or charges on the property to be mortgaged, the amount of the plaintiffs' charges, and any other items entering into the transaction, and the balance to be paid the borrower. After filling up the checks, Dodge would take the check-book, with the filled-up checks, to a member of the firm for signature, showing him the entries in the check-book of the deposit of the client's money, and the statement of Bedell as to the payments to be made; and thereupon the checks would be signed by the plaintiffs, in the name of the individual partner to whom it was presented by Dodge, the firm name being engraved on each check and the individual signature underwritten. Dodge would then take away the check-book, and deliver the several checks to Bedell. In this manner the twenty-seven checks in question were intrusted by the plaintiff to Bedell, their clerk, for delivery to the payees, respectively, therein named, who were in good faith believed by the plaintiffs to be real persons entitled to receive the amount of said checks, respectively, from them or their clients. The defendant paid the checks to a third person, upon an indorsement thereon of the payees named, forged by Bedell, who converted the proceeds to his own use. The names of the payees written in sixteen of the twenty seven checks, drawn for sums aggregating $112,818.72, were not the names of real, but fictitious, persons. The remaining eleven checks, drawn for sums aggregating $85,227.08, were made payable to the order of real persons, whose indorsements were in every case forged by Bedell. Only three of the checks, drawn for less than $2,400, were paid to Bedell by defendant. All the others were deposited, from time to time, in various other banks in the City of New York, and the money thereon received by Bedell from these banks, and the checks all ultimately paid by defendant through the exchanges in the clearing house, in the due and regular course of business. As to the sixteen checks payable to the order of fictitious persons, the plaintiffs were led by fraudulent contrivances and representations on the part of Bedell, the details of which appear in the record, to believe, and they did in fact believe, until the discovery of the forgeries, that such payees were real persons; and as to all the checks the plaintiffs did not intend that any of them should go into circulation, or should be paid by the defendant, otherwise than through a delivery to and indorsement by the payee named therein. The checks were paid in every case by the defendant without any inquiry as to the genuineness of the indorsements, and in reliance upon the responsibility of the parties presenting the same, and not in reliance upon anything done or forborne by the plaintiffs, except that they were signed by them. There is no claim that, at the time the defendant paid the checks, it had any knowledge or suspicion or reason to suspect that any of the indorsements were forged, or that any of the names were fictitious, or that there was any fraud or irregularity in respect to any of the checks, or any indorsement or writing thereon. The plaintiffs' confidence in Bedell, and his representation to them in all their dealings with clients, concerning loans on real estate, continued without interruption until one of these clients, upon examining a fabricated mortgage sent to him by Bedell, had his attention arrested by the faintness of the impression of the seal of the register on the certificate of record, so that he sent the mortgage to the register's office for a better sealing. This led to the discovery of all the frauds, forgeries, fabrications of documents, attestations and official certificates carried on by him in the plaintiffs' office for more than four years. The plaintiffs did not discover that the indorsements on the checks had been forged, or that the amount thereof had not been paid to them or their order, until nearly four months after May 22, 1888, which was the date of the last check so forged. On the discovery of the facts, and before the com-commencement of this action, the plaintiffs tendered the checks to the defendant, and demanded that the amount of the same should be paid to them or credited in their account by the defendant, which tender and demand were refused.

The various deposits of money, made from time to time by the plaintiffs with the defendant, created the relation of debtor and creditor, and the law implies a contract on the part of the defendant to disburse the money standing to the plaintiffs' credit only upon their order and in conformity with their directions. The defendant is not entitled to charge against the plaintiffs' account any sums as payments, unless they have been made to such persons as the plaintiffs directed. Such payments as were made without the order of the plaintiffs of their funds by the defendant afforded to it no protection, when called upon by the plaintiffs to account for the money deposited. Payments made upon forged indorsements are at the peril of the Bank, unless it can claim protection upon some principle of estoppel or some negligence chargeable to the depositor. These rules are so familiar and so well established and illustrated by the adjudged cases that a bare reference to them is all that is needful here. Crawford v. West Side Bank, 100 N. Y. 53, 1 Cent. Rep. 253; Albion Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 86; Corn Exchange Bank v. Nassau Bank, 91 N. Y. 80; Phœnix Bank of New York City v. Risley, 111 U. S. 125, 28 L. ed. 874; Bank of British North America v. Merchants Nat. Bank, 91 N. Y. 106; Chicago Marine Bank v. Fulton County Bank, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 256, 17 L. ed. 787; Washington First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 847, 24 L. ed. 281; Citizens Nat. Bank v. Importers & T. Bank, 119 N. Y. 195.

The statement of the account made by the defendant to the plaintiffs, from time to time, the balancing of the bank pass-book, and the return of the same to the plaintiffs with the vouchers, including, as they did, the checks in controversy, with the forged indorsements thereon, constitute no obstacle to the maintenance of this action by the plaintiffs, as they were ignorant of the facts and circumstances under which the checks were issued and put in circulation. An account thus stated can always be opened upon proof of mistake or fraud; and the only effect of the plaintiffs' silence as to the correctness of the account rendered by the defendant is to put upon them, in this action, the burden of showing that the account, as stated, was the result of fraud or mistake,—a burden which they have fully assumed and met, as the referee has found.

It is urged that the plaintiffs owed the duty to the defendant of examining the vouchers returned to them with the balanced pass-book, from time to time, and that a careful examination of the same would have disclosed the fact that the money was received upon the checks by Bedell, and his forgeries thus detected. The duty of examining the returned vouchers was delegated by the plaintiffs to their cashier and book-keeper who was a faithful and competent person for many years in plaintiffs' employ. The referee found as a fact, from all the circumstances of the case, that the failure to discover the forgeries sooner than they were was not, in any case, caused by any neglect on the part of the plaintiffs, or their cashier, of any duty that the plaintiffs owed to the defendant. The examination of the checks would of course enable the plaintiffs to ascertain whether their own signature was genuine, and whether the amount, date, or name of the payee had been changed, but would not necessarily enable them to detect the forgery of the payee's name. The law imposed no duty upon the plaintiffs to do more than they did to ascertain whether the indorsements on the checks were genuine. The defendant's contract was to pay the checks only upon a genuine indorsement. The drawer is not presumed to know, and in fact seldom does know, the signature of the payee. The Bank must, at its own peril, determine that question. It has the opportunity, by requiring identification when the check is presented, or a responsible guaranty from the party presenting it, of ascertaining whether the indorsement is genuine or not. When it returns the check to the depositor, as evidence of a payment made by his direction, the latter has the right to assume that the bank has ascertained the fact to be that the indorsement is genuine. Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68; Welsh v. German American Bank, 78 N. Y. 424; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209; Washington First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 847, 24 L. ed. 281; Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 107, 29 L. ed. 816.

The plaintiffs committed the examination of the vouchers when returned from the bank to a faithful and competent cashier, who failed to discover the forged indorsements. There is not the slightest reason to believe that, if the checks had been examined by one of the plaintiffs themselves, the result would have been any different. We are unable to see that anything was done or omitted by the plaintiffs, with respect to the examination of the indorsements upon the vouchers, that excuses the defendant from its obligation to pay only upon a genuine order. Nor can we perceive anything done or omitted by the plaintiffs in the general conduct and management of their business, or in the employment of and confidence reposed in Bedell, that estops them from alleging that the twenty-seven checks were paid without their authority. Whether the plaintiffs were guilty of any negligence in that regard was a question of fact, and the finding is that they were, in so far as the defendant was concerned, reasonably prudent and careful, and that the payment of the checks was not caused by any negligence on their part, and we do not think it can be said that this finding is without evidence. Moreover it is found that the defendant paid the twenty-seven checks, in each case, without any inquiry as to the genuineness of the indorsements, and in reliance upon the responsibility of the persons presenting the same for payment, and not in reliance upon anything done or forborne by the plaintiffs, except the fact that the checks had been drawn by them; and, further, that all the checks, except the three paid directly to Bedell, and amounting to less than $2,400, were presented to the defendant by and paid to banks perfectly solvent, and liable to respond to the defendant for all moneys paid upon the forged indorsements.

These findings, supported as they are, by the evidence, dispose of much of the argument upon which it is sought to establish the proposition that the plaintiffs are, by reason of their own acts and omissions, estopped from claiming that the checks were paid by the defendant without their authority. The facts upon which an estoppel must always be based are found against the defendant. Bedell, in issuing the forged checks and fabricating the false papers to conceal his crimes, did not act as the plaintiffs' agent, and his acts in this regard are not binding upon them, nor are they in any manner affected by his knowledge of the facts. The questions that arise in this case, and are so ably and elaborately discussed in the briefs of counsel, with respect to the examination of the returned checks and pass-book, the manner in which the plaintiffs' business was conducted, and the degree of care and supervision that was exercised over their subordinates, how far the plaintiffs are bound by the criminal acts and knowledge of their clerk, as well as the general rule of estoppel, when applied to this class of cases, are not new. They have been frequently and fully discussed in the numerous cases in this court, involving the rights and duties of banks and depositors, and it would extend this opinion beyond reasonable limits, and serve no useful purpose, to go over the ground again. Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, Welsh v. German American Bank and Weisser v. Denison, supra; People v. Bank of North America, 75 N. Y. 547; Leather Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Morgan, supra; Mayor v. Bank of England, L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 160. It is enough to state our general conclusion, that with respect to all these points, the defendant has failed to establish any defense to the action.

It is claimed by the defendant that the sixteen checks made payable to the order of persons having no existence were, in legal effect, payable to bearer. It is provided by statute that paper made payable to the order of a fictitious person, and negotiated by the maker, has the same validity, "as against the maker and all persons having knowledge of the facts, as if payable to bearer." 1 Rev. Stat. p. 768, § 5. We are of the opinion, upon examination of the authorities cited by counsel on both sides, that this rule applies only to paper put into circulation by the maker with knowledge that the name of the payee does not represent a real person. The maker's intention is the controlling consideration which determines the character of such paper. It cannot be treated as payable to bearer, unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends to make the paper payable to a fictitious person. Irving Nat. Bank v. Alley, 79 N. Y. 586; Turnbull v. Bouyer, 40 N. Y. 456; Vagliano v. Bank of England, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 108, on appeal L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 248; Armstrong v. Pomeroy Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 6 L. R. A. 625; Gibson v. Minst, 1 H. Bl. 569.

The findings of the referee that the plaintiffs in good faith believed that the names of the payees represented real persons, entitled to receive from them the amount of the check in each case, having been led to believe this by the fraudulent contrivances of Bedell, and that they intended that Bedell should deliver the check to a real payee therein named, and that they did not intend that they should go into circulation or be paid by defendant otherwise than through a delivery to and indorsement by the payee named, and that plaintiffs gave no authority to Bedell to indorse the name of the payee, or to put the checks into circulation, and that no one in fact relied on any appearance of authority, derived from the plaintiffs, in Bedell to indorse the payee's name upon the checks, or to put them in circulation, disposes of this question. The indorsement of the names of the fictitious payees upon the checks, with intent to deceive and to put the checks in circulation, constituted the crime of forgery, by means of which, and without any fault of the plaintiffs, payment was obtained thereon. The defendant does not occupy any different position with reference to the checks payable to fictitious payees than it does with reference to those payable to real parties whose indorsements were forged. Bedell, of course knew that the payees were fictitious, but he was not acting within the scope of his employment, but in carrying out a scheme of fraud upon the plaintiffs, and under such circumstances his knowledge cannot be imputed to his principals. Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, Weisser v. Denison and Welsh v. German American Bank, supra; Case v. Case, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 643, 644.

The case presents another and peculiar question. It seems that ten of the eleven checks, which were made payable to the order of real persons, were made good by Bedell to the several payees, and the defendant has set up these facts in its answer as a partial equitable defense. The referee made no finding on the subject, but Bedell so testified, and was not contradicted, and the question arises upon a request by the defendant to find, in substance, that, the amount of these ten checks having been made good by Bedell to the several payees, the plaintiffs, having sustained no loss by reason of the payment thereof, are not entitled to recover in this action, against the defendant, any sum on account of or by reason of the payment by defendant of the same. The request was refused, and the defendant excepted. Keeping in view the theory of this action, and regarding the evidence before the referee, we cannot perceive that there was any error in refusing the requests. Bedell testified, in substance, that at the time of the commencement of the action the plaintiffs were liable to clients to the extent of $264,000 on account of his frauds. There were $200,000 in fabricated mortgages which had been delivered by Bedell to clients on account of an equal sum of money paid by the clients to plaintiffs for investment, and which Bedell had converted to his own use. The $64,000 was obtained through other frauds upon clients which the plaintiffs were liable to be called upon to make good. One of the plaintiffs testified that his firm had actually paid to clients on account of Bedell's frauds over $242,000. It was not shown by what funds or in what manner Bedell made good to the payees the amount of the checks intended for them. None of the money paid by him was traced to the defendant. The plaintiffs' action was not upon the checks, nor for damages by reason of their payment, but on defendant's implied promise to pay the money deposited to the plaintiffs or upon their order. The plaintiffs' case was made out without the checks at all, except so far as they were necessary as proof to open the account stated. In substance, the referee was asked to hold that by reason of the payment by Bedell of the amount of the checks to the persons named therein, without any reference to the source from which the money came, they were to be charged to the plaintiffs the same as if paid by their authority. The proof given did not justify this conclusion. As it was not shown that such payment was made at the expense or to the injury of the defendant, or that the plaintiffs profited by it, the cause of action stated in the complaint was not affected by the fact. It is no doubt true that indemnity to the payees of checks diverted as these were, made by the wrong-doer, might, under certain circumstances, constitute a basis for equitable relief in an action of this kind, but the proof did not go far enough to warrant it in this case.

The very recent case of Vagliano v. Bank of England occupied such a prominent place in the discussions of the questions involved in this appeal by the courts below, and it is now so earnestly pressed upon our attention by the learned counsel for the defendant as a controlling authority in support of his views, that we consider it necessary to refer to it, and point out, so far as we can, the rule or principle which it decides. In the magnitude of the sum involved, the boldness and ingenuity with which a clerk perpetrated a stupendous fraud upon his employer, and in many other respects, that case doubtless bears a very strong resemblance to this. The question there was whether the defendant was entitled to debit the plaintiff, one of its depositors, with forty-three forged bills of exchange, amounting in the aggregate to £71,500, which it had paid, upon genuine acceptance by the plaintiff, but procured by fraud under substantially the following circumstances: Vagliano, the plaintiff, was a merchant and foreign banker in London, with correspondents in various parts of the world, and transacting an enormous business with the defendant, his general banker. He employed in his office a considerable number of clerks, and among them one Glyka, who had charge of the foreign correspondence. One Vucina, a merchant and banker at Odessa, was, and for thirty years had been, one of Vagliano's correspondents, transacting with him a large business, and having practically unlimited credit. For many years he had drawn drafts for large amounts, when necessary, upon the plaintiff, payable sometimes to his own order, but more frequently to the order of a payee named therein. The course of business in the office was well known to Glyka, who procured specimens of Vucina's letters of advice, which always preceded the drafts, and specimens of the drafts themselves. Having done so, he had paper prepared identical in general appearance and texture with that upon which Vucina's genuine letters and bills were written. This enabled him to forge letters of advice and drafts with Vucina's name as drawer, which he executed with extraordinary skill, and in each case he wrote upon the face of the bill, as payees, the name of C. Petrida & Co., a firm who carried on business at Constantinople, and had business relations with Vucina, but had no connection whatever with the fabricated drafts. Glyka caused these forged letters of advice and drafts to be laid before Vagliano, his principal, who, being deceived by the skillful manner in which the papers were prepared, and the confidence he reposed in his clerks, wrote a genuine acceptance on the face of each bill, as it was put before him from time to time, during a period of some four months, payable in every case at the Bank of England. These fabricated bills, having been thus accepted, were placed with the other and genuine bills in a box in the office, to be delivered according to the usual course of business to the proper party, when called for. Glyka stole the bills from the box, forged the indorsement of the payees thereon, presented them at the counter of the bank, and received the money thereon. By the English Bills of Exchange Act of 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61, § 7, subd. 8), it was enacted, with reference to bills of exchange, that, "where the payee is a fictitious or nonexisting person, the bill may be treated as payable to bearer." The bank defended upon two grounds: first, that they were protected by this Statute; and, secondly, that the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence as precluded him from claiming that the payments made upon these bills were without authority. On the trial of the action, before Mr. Justice Charles, the plaintiff recovered. L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 103. On appeal the judgment was affirmed, the master of the rolls alone dissenting, on the ground that the bank was protected by the Bills of Exchange Act. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 243. Thus far the views of the court, on both hearings, were in harmony with the contention of the plaintiffs in the case at bar, both as to the construction of the Statute and the facts bearing on the question of negligence. The judgment, however, has recently been reversed by the House of Lords, and we have been furnished with copies of the opinions given upon the final decision of the appeal, and have given to them the careful consideration which the high authority of the tribunal from which they emanate and the importance of the case seem to demand. The main point upon which the case turned in the review by the House of Lords, as we understand the opinions, was the construction to be given the Bills of Exchange Act. It was held, contrary to the opinions below, that, whenever the name inserted as payee is without any intention that payment shall only be made in conformity therewith, the payee then becomes a fictitious person, within the meaning of the Act, and therefore the forty-three bills were within the Statute, though Petrida & Co. were in fact existing and real persons. When this conclusion was reached, the plaintiffs' case necessarily failed, as it was but another way of stating that the bank paid the fabricated bills according to their legal tenor and effect, and according to the plaintiffs' directions, that is, to bearer. It is hardly necessary to add that, if we could follow that case in giving construction to our Statute, the same result would follow in this case. But it is quite obvious that we cannot. The language is different. Our Statute is a codification of the common law, while the English Statute is, and was intended to be, a departure from it. In so far as the opinions deal with the facts of the case, upon the question of negligence, it is difficult to deduce from them any abstract rule or principle. Moreover, there is, as it seems to us, a material difference, in some respects, between the facts in that case and the one at bar. Vagliano, through the contrivances of his clerk, had put before him a fabricated bill, the spurious character of which he failed to detect, and he affixed to it a genuine acceptance, thereby accrediting it to the bank as a genuine instrument. He left the bill thus accepted, in a place where the dishonest clerk could easily purloin it. The manner in which the business was conducted was such as to enable the clerk to possess himself of the means whereby the fraud was successfully carried out without check or detection. The view of the case taken in the opinions delivered in the House of Lords, aside from the question of the construction of the Statute, may very well be attributed to a different shading in the facts, and to the further consideration which can be inferred from the record, that that tribunal is not confined, as we are, to a review of the courts below upon questions of law only. For these reasons the Vagliano Case cannot be regarded as authority adverse to the conclusion at which we have arrived in this. We have examined the other exceptions appearing in the record, to which our attention has been directed, and we are of the opinion that none of them can be sustained.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Rule as to valuation fixed in bill of lading.

As a general rule, and in the absence of fraud or imposition a common carrier is answerable for the loss of a package of goods, though he is ignorant of its contents and though its contents are ever so valuable, if he does not make a special acceptance. But if the shipper is guilty of fraud or imposition,

Statement by Horton, C. J.:

On the 4th day of November, 1887, Peter T. Foley brought his action against the Pacific Express Company before a justice of the peace of Douglas County to recover $175, for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in the transportation of a box containing type and electrotypes plates from Kansas City, Mo., to Lawrence, in this State, on October 15, 1887, from the A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Company at Kansas City, Mo., by the Pacific Express Company. The following is a copy of the receipt given by the Express Company for the box in controversy:

"Read this receipt.

And it is hereby expressly agreed that the said Pacific Express Company are not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only, nor for any loss or damage of any box, package, or thing for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is herein stated, nor for any loss or damage by fire, the acts of God, or of the enemies of the government, the restraint of governments, mobs, riots, insurrections, or pirates, or from any of the dangers incident to a time of war; nor upon any property or thing, unless properly packed and secured for transportation; nor for any fragile fabrics, unless so marked upon the package containing the same; nor upon any fabrics consisting of or contained in glass. If any sum of money, besides the charge for transportation, is to be collected from consignee on delivery of the property described herein, and the same is not paid within thirty days from date hereof, the shipper agrees that this company may return said property to him, at their option, at the expiration of that time, subject to the conditions of this receipt, and that he will pay the charges for transportation both ways, and that the liability of this Company for such property, while in its possession, for the purpose of making such collection, shall be that of warehouse men only. And it is further agreed that the said Pacific Express Company shall not be held liable for any claim, of whatsoever nature, arising from this contract, unless such claim shall be presented in writing sixty days from date hereof, in a statement to which his receipt shall be annexed; and the shipper and owner hereby severally agree that all the stipulations and conditions in this receipt contained shall extend to and inure to the benefit of each and every company or person to whom the Pacific Express Company may intrust or deliver the above-described property for transportation (which the said Pacific Express Company is hereby authorized to do), and shall define and limit the liability therefor of such other company or person:

Before the commencement of this action, J. K. Johnston, superintendent of the Pacific Express Company, tendered to Mr. Foley for that company $50, in payment for the damage to the box, but Mr. Foley refused to accept that amount. district court. Trial had before the court with a jury at the February Term, 1888. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff for $144.55, with interest, and also made special findings. Subsequently judgment was rendered upon the general verdict. The defendant excepted, and brings the case here.

Mr. John Hutchings for defendant in error.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question in this case is, What effect is to be given to the following language of the receipt executed by the Express Company? "It is hereby expressly agreed that the said Pacific Express Company is not to be held liable for any loss or damage, except as forwarders only; nor for any loss or damage of any box, package or thing for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is herein stated." It appears that the type and electrotype plates were shipped from Kansas City to Lawrence by the A. N. Kellogg Newspaper Company, who, in making the shipment, acted for Peter T. Foley. It also appears that the newspaper company had a receipt-book furnished by the express company, and in the heading to each page were printed conditions, and, among others, the one quoted. The newspaper company, having this book in their possession and control and using it from day to day must be presumed to have known of its conditions, and to have shipped with reference to it. In this they acted for the plaintiff, and he must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt. The jury made the following special findings in answer to questions submitted to them: "Q. Was not the box containing the type and electrotypes in controversy broken while it was still in the car in which it was brought from Kansas City? A. It was found broken in the car. 2. If you should find that said box was broken open by any negligence of the Company, state what act or thing caused said box to be broken. A. We do not know. Q. Do the jury know where on the journey the box was broken open? If so, state where. A. We do not know. Q. Were not the agents of defendant negligent in taking the box out of the car? A. Yes. Q. Could they not have saved the contents of the box by handling the box carefully when it was taken out of the car? A. Yes, to the best of our knowledge and belief."

The district court, among other things, instructed the jury that "while a common carrier is generally, in the absence of any such limitation, liable absolutely, as an insurer, against all loss except that caused by the act of God and the public enemy, it may limit such liability by special conditions such as contained in this receipt, but such special contract cannot relieve the Company from its own negligence. It follows that in this case the Company is liable, if at all, not as an insurer, but solely for negligence in the transportation of the property. 'Negligence,' is a negative term, implying the want or absence of ordinary care; that is, that care and caution that men of ordinary prudence usually exercise under like circumstances. Whether the defendant Company was so negligent, and, if so, whether such negligence caused the injuries complained of, are questions of fact for the jury, to be determined from all the evidence. You should consider the condition of the material when delivered to them; the manner in which it was boxed; the nature of the articles, so far as they could be seen and known by the shipper; the manner in which such property is handled; the condition and circumstances in which it was found at the place of destination; and taking into consideration all the surrounding circumstances and facts proven, and using that ordinary knowledge, observation, and experience in life that men generally possess, you must say whether the loss and injury were attributable to the want of ordinary care and diligence on the part of the Express Company. If they were, the plaintiff may recover his actual loss; otherwise, he cannot recover beyond the sum of $50." The Express Company asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "(1) The jury are instructed to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $50. (2) The agreement in the receipt that defendant will not be liable for more than $50, for any shipment, unless the true value of such shipment is stated in the receipt, is a valid agreement, and relieves the defendant of liability as insurer for all amounts over $50, leaving it liable in excess of $50 only for gross negligence, and the burden of proving gross negligence is upon the plaintiff."

1. It is settled by the decisions of this court, and by the great weight of authority, that a common carrier cannot stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants, on grounds of public policy, even by express contract. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Simpson, 80 Kan. 645; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, and the cases therein cited; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 822. But this is not the question presented by the record in this case. The receipt executed by the Express Company, and knowingly and voluntarily accepted by the shipper through his agent, expressly provided "that the Express Company was not to be liable for any loss or damage to the box, for over $50, if the just and true value thereof was not stated." The true and just value of the box was not stated in the receipt or to the Company by the shipper. The trial court very properly instructed the jury "that the shipper must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt." Two questions are therefore presented for our determination: First. May a common carrier limit his liability to an amount stated in a written receipt or special contract, in the event of loss or injury to the goods or property through ordinary negligence, if such special contract is freely, voluntarily, and fairly entered into by the parties, and such contract is just and reasonable in its terms? Second. Did the written receipt or special contract between the shipper and Express Company in this case limit the liability of the Company for loss or injury to the amount of $50?

The better authorities declare the law to be that the value of the property transported may be agreed upon, and the damage or loss to the property occasioned by the negligence of the Company or its servants will be limited to the agreed valuation. The Hart Case, 112 U. S. 381, 28 L. ed. 717, may now be called the leading case in America. Mr. Justice Blatchford, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said, among other things, that "it is the law of this court that a common carrier may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability, but that he cannot stipulate for exemption from the consequences of his own negligence or that of his servants. . . . There is no justice in allowing the shipper to be paid a large value for an article which he has induced the carrier to take at a low rate of freight, on the assertion and agreement that its value is a less sum than that claimed after a loss. It is just to hold the shipper to his agreement, fairly made as to value, even where the loss or injury has occurred through the negligence of the carrier. . . . The limitation as to value has no tendency to exempt from liability for negligence. It does not induce want of care. It exacts from the carrier the measure of care due to the value agreed on. The carrier is bound to respond in that value for negligence. The compensation for carriage is based upon that value. The shipper is estopped from saying that the value is greater. The articles have no greater value, for the purpose of the contract of transportation, between the parties to that contract. The carrier must respond for negligence up to that value. It is just and reasonable that such a contract, fairly entered into, and where there is no deceit practiced on the shipper, should be upheld. There is no violation of public policy. On the contrary, it would be unjust and unreasonable, and would be repugnant to the soundest principles of fair dealing and of the freedom of contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if a shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss." See also Harvey v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 74 Mo. 539; Brehme v. Dinmore 25 Md. 329; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sherrod, 84 Ala. 178; Duntley v. Boston & M. R. (N. H.) 9 L. R. Payne*, 86 Va. 481, 6 L. R. A. 849.

As to the second question proposed, we think that the limitation in the written receipt or special contract not to be liable for any loss or damage over $50, in this case, stands as if the carrier had asked the value of the box and its contents, and had been told by the shipper "that the value was $50 only," or, which is the same thing, had been told by the shipper "that, if loss or damage occurred to the box or its contents, he would not demand over $50." In Kallman v. United States Exp. Co., 8 Kan. 205, it was said that "no value was given in the bill of lading which was delivered to the shipper by the Express Company, and received by him without objection, thus consenting and agreeing that the plaintiffs should be bound by its terms. If he had desired to make the Company responsible for the full value of the goods, he had only to furnish them with the amount, and have it inserted in the bill. But it may be said that the Company was bound to make inquiry as to the value of the goods, if they desired to obtain the benefit of this limitation upon their liability. We confess that we are not able to see any good reason for making such a requirement a condition precedent in such case. The Company exhibits to the employer the exact condition upon which it will receive his property for carriage, to which he may assent or not, as he may choose. If he assent, we think he should be bound thereby. As in this case, if the real value of the property was $592.63, the employer, in case of loss, would be as much, nay more, interested in having such value truly stated in the bill of lading or receipt as the Company could possibly be in having the value understated. He ought, then, to have made known to the Company the true value of the goods, and more especially as the limitation upon the liability of the Company was so plainly stated in the receipt." We do not quote this part of the opinion in the above case because it is necessarily conclusive or binding as a prior decision of this court, as, in that case, the trial court granted a new trial. This court affirmed the action of the court below. Much said in the former opinion, outside of affirming the action of the court in granting a new trial, we consider obiter dictum. The trial court in that case, in granting the new trial, did not pass upon a pure, simple and unmixed question of law. This court has decided time and again that "the granting of a new trial is largely in the discretion of the trial court; and where a new trial is given, and the record does not show upon what grounds the court granted such new trial, but the record does show errors upon which the trial court might have granted a new trial, the order granting such trial will not be disturbed." Barney v. Dudley, 40 Kan. 247; Howell v. Pugh, 25 Kan. 96; Sedan v. Church, 29 Kan. 190. See Betz v. Williams & W. Land & L. Co. (recently decided).

"It is a maxim, not to be disregarded, that general expressions in every opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious." Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 264, 399, 400, 5 L. ed. 257, 290. But we have referred to that part of the Kallman opinion because the court below charged the jury "that the Kellogg Newspaper Company, having this receipt-book in its possession and control, and using it from day to day, must be presumed to have known of such conditions, and to have shipped with reference to it. In this it acted for the plaintiff, and he must be presumed to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt;" and because this part of the charge of the trial court and the part of the opinion quoted from the Kallman Case is in accordance with reason, fairness and justice. This part of the opinion also answers the objection "that the value of the property transported was not agreed upon."

As is forcibly argued by counsel, "the Express Company took the property, and signed a receipt presented to it by plaintiff's agent. It is true that it was one of a book of receipts furnished by the Express Company, but the receipts were all in blank, the printed part containing all the regulations that the Express Company required the shipper to comply with. The blanks were all left for the shipper to fill in any way he pleased; and in whatever way he filled the blanks the Express Company was bound to receipt for the property covered by the receipt. When the shipper had filled the blank and presented it to the Express Company for its signature, he was in the attitude of proposing an agreement to the Express Company for acceptance. The signature of the Express Company was the completion of the agreement, and the agreement as completed, so far as it related to the value of the property, was not a limitation of liability for negligence in any way, but a square agreement that the property presented for carriage and covered by the receipt was only worth $50." In Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co., 69 Ill. 62, the facts were about as follows: May and Stern shipped by the United States Express Company a box weighing twenty-five pounds, from New York City to Oppenheimer & Co., at Chicago, Ill. It contained jewelry of the value of $3,800. The receipt given by the Express Company was similar in that case to the receipt given by the Pacific Express Company in this case. The blank for the value of the box and contents was not filled in. But the limitation of $50 was in the receipt in that case, as in this. The box and its contents were destroyed by fire in the office of the Express Company at Chicago. Oppenheimer & Co. brought an action to recover for the value of the contents of the box. Judgment was rendered in their favor for $50 only. They appealed. The judgment of the lower court was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Illinois. In rendering its opinion that court said: "The terms and conditions on which the company received the property for transportation were clearly expressed in the body of the receipt, and in a way not calculated to escape attention. It must be supposed that these men paid some attention to the transaction of their business, and were reasonably well informed in regard to the nature of their contracts. That they should have been so, doing business with this Company for years, handling, filling out, and procuring the execution of these shipping receipts without a knowledge of their general character and effect, it is difficult to believe. They must be held to have had such knowledge.

A distinction exists between the effect of those notices by a carrier which seek to discharge him from duties which the law has annexed to his employment, and those, like the one in question, designed simply to insure good faith and fair dealing on the part of his employer,—in the former case, notice alone not being effectual without an assent to the attempted restriction; while in the latter case, notice alone, if brought home to the knowledge of the owner of the property delivered for carriage, will be sufficient." A part of the syllabus of that case reads. "An express company has the right to demand from a consignor such information as will enable it to decide on the proper compensation to charge for the risk, and the degree of care to bestow in discharging its trust; and a limitation of its liability not to exceed $50, unless the value of the goods forwarded is truly stated, if brought to the knowledge of the consignor, is reasonable and consistent with public policy." The court finally disposed of the above case upon the ground that there was a "designed suppression of the value of the goods." It was said in the opinion, among other things, that "there was an actual attempt here by the agent of the shippers to fill in this blank space, but, instead of inserting '3,800' (the value), a mark or character was inserted inexpressive of any value. This shows that there was a designed suppression of the value of the goods. That was unfair conduct on the part of the shipper of the goods. The effect of such conduct to relieve the carrier from his liability as insurer is asserted in many cases [here decisions are given]. Had the true value of the goods been disclosed, there would have been an extra charge of $9.50, increased precautions would have been taken for the safety of the goods, and, as the evidence shows, they would have been saved."

It may be said, in every case, that where a shipper fixes an agreed valuation upon his goods to be transported, or enters into a special contract with the carrier that if his goods are lost or injured he will not demand over $50, and thereby obtains cheaper rates, he is guilty of fraud, or attempted fraud, if his goods are lost or injured, and he demands for his damages an amount above the valuation or limitation agreed to. If it be true, as the trial court charged the jury, that "the plaintiff must be presumed, under the facts of this case, to have assented to the terms and conditions of the receipt," then, within the better authorities, the limitation of the carrier's liability, not to exceed $50, was the same as fixing the value of the property transported at $50 only, and the limitation of the Express Company's liability, not to exceed the $50 stated in the receipt, was reasonable and just. Boorman v. American

Exp. Co., 21 Wis. 154, is a case like this. A limitation of $50 was contained in the receipt. Chief Justice Dixon, writing the opinion, held that an "express company may exempt itself by special contract from liability as insurer; or for the default or negligence of any person to whom the property may be delivered by it, for the performance of any act or duty in respect thereto, off its own routes; or for loss or damage of any package for over $50, unless the just and true value thereof is stated in the receipt." In Duntley v. Boston & M. R., supra, it was decided that "a regulation of a carrier with respect to the transportation of live animals, which fixes the ordinary value of horses, for which it will hold itself responsible in case of loss, at $200 each, and requires extra compensation for transporting animals of greater value, is reasonable and valid."

In Durbin v. American Exp. Co. (N. H. 1860), 20 Atl. Rep. 828, the receipt was like the one in this case, and limited the liability to $50. It was held that "a shipper of goods who fills out one of the blank receipts contained in a book previously furnished by an express company for his use, and obtains the signature of the company's agent thereto, upon delivering to him a package for transportation, will be presumed to know the contents of the receipt; and, if he receives such receipt without objection, his assent as to its conditions will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusively presumed." Clark, J., in delivering the opinion in that case, said: "The receipt signed by the defendant's agent and servant at the time of the delivery of the package was taken by the plaintiff as evidence of the fact and purpose of its delivery, and of the terms and conditions on which the defendants received it. The receipt was contained in a book of blank receipts previously furnished by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff, and the written portions were in his handwriting, and the law presumes that the contents were known to him. The plaintiff understood it to be the shipping contract, and, in the absence of fraud, by receiving it without objection, he was conclusively presumed to assent to its conditions." Merrill v. American Exp. Co. 62 N. H. 514; Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505.

"It is now generally held that the responsibility imposed on the carrier of goods by the common law may be restricted and qualified by express stipulation, where such stipulation is just and reasonable; and a stipulation that the carrier shall be informed as to the value of the goods delivered to him for carriage, as affecting the risk, and the degree of care required, is clearly reasonable. . . . The plaintiff understood that he was securing transportation of the box to New York at a reduced rate (in fact, at one fifth of the regular rate), by calling the value $50, and assuming a portion of the risk of carriage himself; and, having agreed upon a valuation for the purpose of fixing the express charges, he cannot insist that the goods are of greater value, for the purpose of increasing his claim for damages for the loss. Nor is it material whether the loss arose from the negligence of the defendants or some other cause. The defendants agreed to respond in a sum not exceeding $50 in case of loss, and, for the purpose of the contract of transportation between the parties to the contract, the goods had no greater value." See also, to the same effect, Squire v. New York Cent. R. Co. 98 Mass. 389; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Henlein, 52 Ala. 615; Magnin v. Dinsmore, 56 N. Y. 168; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Weakly, 50 Ark. 397.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wynn, 88 Tenn. 820, special contracts for a limitation of the liability of a carrier are not sustained. It is said in that case, among other things, that "to our minds it is perfectly clear that the two kinds of stipulation—that providing for total, and that providing for partial, exemption from liability for the consequences of the carrier's negligence—stand upon the same ground, and must be tested by the same principles. If one can be enforced, the other can; if either be invalid, both must be held to be so,—the same considerations of public policy operating in each case." In our opinion, the reasons stated are wholly untenable. They proceed upon false premises. That court overlooks the power of the shipper to freely and fairly fix a valuation upon his own property. The carrier has the right to make reasonable rates for carriage. A total exemption from the liability on the part of a carrier would not be just or reasonable, and no person, having reason, would willingly and freely contract with a carrier that the property which he wished to have transported was absolutely worthless. The carrier is bound to receive and transport the property of the shipper. The shipper can place his own valuation upon the property delivered by him to the carrier to be transported. The carrier cannot arbitrarily fix any valuation on the property received from the shipper, but may reasonably insist on proper information as to the value of the property which he receives. He ought to have a right to know what it is that he undertakes to carry, and the amount and extent of his risk. Upon the value of the property, the risk incurred, and the distance the property is to be transported, the charges for carriage are fixed. Therefore it would seem to us that a contract fixing the value of the goods delivered to the carrier, or fixing a limitation for damage in case of loss or injury, is clearly reasonable, as affecting the risk and the degree of care required concerning the property to be transported. With the above and foregoing limitations, we cannot conceive how the carrier can evade his duty or nullify the law. Upon the authorities cited, the instructions of the trial court were erroneous, and the instruction prayed for by the Express Company for limitation as to damages should have been given.

There is nothing appearing in the evidence or the findings of the jury that show, or tend to show, gross negligence, fraud or intentional wrong upon the part of the Express Company. In the case of Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Simpson, 80 Kan. 645, the limitation was arbitrarily fixed by the carrier without the consent of the shipper. That contract was not just or reasonable, or freely or fairly entered into. It was in violation of public policy. It is unlike this case, because, when the box in controversy was shipped, the shipping clerk of the Kellogg Newspaper Company filled out a receipt, and a man by the name of Glass, a driver for the Pacific Express Company, signed it. No deceit or unfairness was practiced by the Express Company. In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Orall, 88 Kan. 679, gross negligence was involved. Whether a telegraph company could exempt itself by contract from ordinary negligence was not passed upon. That question was reserved. We do not think it is necessary to follow all that was stated in Kallman v. United States Exp. Co., supra, because, although that decision was made nearly 25 years ago, the question now at issue was not necessarily embraced in that decision, for the reasons heretofore named. The case of Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Simpson, supra, followed New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 637. This case is referred to and clearly distinguished in the latter case of Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra. Again, the box containing the type and plates was shipped from Kansas City Mo. The receipt executed by the express company was executed and delivered at Kansas City, Mo., to the Kellogg Newspaper Company for P. T. Foley, the plaintiff below. In that State the law declared by the supreme court is that "a contract fairly entered into between carrier and shipper, specifying a fixed sum as the value of the property and limiting the recovery in case of loss to that sum, is binding on the shipper." Harvey v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 74 Mo. 588. We must assume, so far as this case is concerned, that the parties, including the shipper and the Express Company, contracted with reference to the law of Missouri. The receipt was signed there, the box was delivered there, and was shipped from Missouri to Kansas. It seems to us that the shipper ought not to complain. If he had desired to insert in the receipt, which the Express Company was asked to sign, $144.55 as the full value of the box, or if he had desired to insert any larger amount, he had the option so to do, and if he had inserted the full value of the box and its contents he could have recovered the value. But as the shipper voluntarily limited his loss or damage to the sum of $50 only, why should he refuse to receive the sum of $50, which was tendered him by the superintendent of the Express Company when he presented his claim for damages? The receipt, as executed, was just as he desired and wished it. The damage in case of loss or injury to the box or its contents was liquidated in advance by the voluntary action of the parties. "The limitation as to the damages or value has no tendency, in such a case as this, to exempt from liability for negligence." Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra. Generally, the charges for transporting a box or package valued at $144.50, $500, or $1,000, are more than when the value is $50 only, and if the shipper wishes to pay full charges and recover full value, in case of loss or injury from negligence, why should he not state to the carrier, or write in the receipt to be signed by the carrier, the full value? We now repeat what was said upon this point in the Kallman Express Co's Case, 8 Kan. 205, where the receipt was left blank as to the value, as in this case, but where a limitation was inserted in the receipt in case of loss or damage: "The company exhibits to the employer the exact conditions upon which it will receive his property for carriage, to which he may assent or not, as he may choose. If he assent, we think he should be bound thereby. As in this case, if the real value of the property was $592.58, the employer, in case of loss, would be as much, nay more, interested in having such value truly stated in the bill of lading or receipt as the company could possibly be in having the value understated. He ought, then, to have made known to the company the true value of the goods, and more especially as the limitation upon the liability of the company was so plainly stated in the receipt."

The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Johnston, J., concurs.

Valentine, J., dissenting:

I think we should follow the decision made in the case of Kallman v. United States Exp. Co., 8 Kan. 205: first, because it is right; and, second, for the following reasons: It was made on February 17, 1865, more than twenty-six years ago; the courts have been open ever since, and twenty or more sessions of the Legislature have intervened, and yet no modification of any of the rules therein enunciated have been made, but all seem to have been acquiesced in; and for these reasons it must be presumed that the parties to this action, and especially the Express Company, contracted with reference to such rules; and now, to overturn them, and to declare different rules for this case, would virtually be to make a new contract for the parties; and construing the present contract as the contract in that case was construed would render the contract valid, while to construe it as the Express Company now desires to have it construed would render it void. To construe the contract so as to limit the Express Company's common-law liability only as an insurer, and only for losses and injuries brought about by other causes than the Company's own negligence, fraud or willful wrongs, would render the contract valid; while if it be construed in such a manner as to reach to the domain of negligence, fraud and willful wrongs on the part of the Express Company itself, and to limit the Company's liability so that the Company would not be liable for losses occasioned by its own negligence, fraud, or willful wrongs, would render the contract to that extent invalid and worthless. It must be remembered that in this case the value of the property transported was not agreed upon. Whether it was worth one cent, $1, $100, $1,000, or any other sum, greater or less, is left wholly blank. There seems to have been no thought of fixing, by contract or otherwise, the actual value of the property, or any value, but it was actually worth $144.55. In this failure to fix the value of the property by contract, this case differs essentially from the case of Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 112 U. S. 832, 28 L. ed. 718. There are other distinctions between the present case and those relied on by the Express Company. For instance, the shippers themselves, in some of the cases relied on by the Express Company, were guilty of fraud or unfair dealing, as in the case of Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co., 69 Ill. 62, 68. In that case the shippers delivered to the Express Company for transportation a certain box containing watches and jewelry of the value of $3,800, without disclosing its contents or their great value, and paid only $1.40 for its transportation; while, if they had disclosed its contents and their value, they would have had to pay $10.90 for its transportation. The receipt which they took from the Express Company did not state the contents or the value of the goods, but stated, "Contents unknown." The court, in commenting upon these matters, used the following, among other, language: "There was an actual attempt here by the agent of the shippers to fill in this blank space, but, instead of inserting '$3,800' (the value), a mark or character was inserted inexpressive of any value. This shows that there was a designed suppression of the value of the goods. That was unfair conduct on the part of the shippers of the goods. The effect of such conduct to relieve the carrier from his liability as insurer is asserted in the cases of—[here certain cases are given.] Had the true value of the goods been disclosed, there would have been an extra charge of $9.50, increased precautions would have been taken for the safety of the goods, and, as the evidence shows, they would have been saved." In this case of Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co. no pretense of fault or negligence on the part of the Express Company was imputed, but, on the contrary, it was admitted by the parties that the company was not guilty of any fault or negligence; and in the later case of Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chapman, 183 Ill. 96 (decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois on May 14, 1890), it is stated as follows: "In Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co., 69 Ill. 62, the court held that the contract exempting carriers from liabilities is not to be construed as providing against loss or injury occasioned by actual negligence on their part." Indeed, the case of Oppenheimer v. United States Exp. Co. has no application to this present case.

In the present case the shipper was not guilty of fraud or unfair dealing, and the Express Company was unquestionably guilty of culpable negligence. In the case of Orange County Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend. 85, 114 et seq., an intended passenger on a steamboat, without paying extra fare, took with him on the steamboat as baggage an ordinary traveling trunk containing $11,250. In a few minutes afterwards the trunk and its contents were removed, and the owner never recovered them. The owners of the steamboat had no knowledge of the contents of the trunk, nor of their great value, and it was held that they were not liable for their loss.

Other distinctions might be shown between this case and the cases relied on by the Express Company, if it were thought necessary. The stipulation contained in the receipt given by the Express Company in the present case, limiting its liability for loss or damage, does not limit its liability, except with respect to an amount in excess of $50. Up to that amount the Express Company's liability remains precisely the same as it would be at common law, or as it would be if no contract limiting its liability had ever been made. But for the excess above $50 the Express Company claims that it has obtained a boundless immunity from liability; that it has not only obtained an absolute exemption from all liability for all loss or damage above that amount, where the loss or damage has occurred without fault or negligence on its part, but that it has also obtained such an exemption where the loss or damage has been occasioned by its own negligence, or by its own fraud or willful wrongs, including the willful destruction of the property, or the greater wrong of feloniously stealing it. This cannot be correct. The stipulation in such receipt ought to be so construed as to exempt the Company from liability for only such loss or damage in excess of $50 as might be occasioned by the fault or negligence of others, or as might result from some accident, casualty or misfortune over which the Company could have no control. I think the weight of authority sustains this view. While a common carrier may make a valid contract exempting himself from his common-law liability as an insurer and for losses occasioned by the acts of others without his fault, or occasioned by such of his own acts only as do not involve any kind of wrong, or occasioned by circumstances over which he has no control, yet he cannot make a valid contract exempting himself from liability for losses occasioned by his own carelessness or negligence or improper acts. Such a contract would be against public policy and void. I think the contract in the present case should be construed precisely as though it did not attempt to limit the Express Company's liability at all for losses occasioned by its own negligence or improper conduct, and I would refer to the following authorities in support of this view: Kallman v. United States Exp. Co. 3 Kan. 205; Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. Simpson, 80 Kan. 345; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Peavey, 29 Kan. 169; Western U. Tel. Co. v. Crall, 38 Kan. 679; Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 Pa. 53; American Exp. Co. v. Sands, 55 Pa. 140; Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 114 Pa. 523, 5 Cent. Rep. 298; Weiller v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 184 Pa. 310; Southern Exp. Co. v. Moon, 89 Miss. 823; Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Abels, 60 Miss. 1017; Southern Exp. Co. v. Seide, 67 Miss. 609; Kirby v. Adams Exp. Co. 2 Mo. App. 870; McFadden v. Missouri Pac. R. Harris, 120 Ind. 78; Missouri & P. R. Co. v. Harris, 67 Tex. 166; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Macdon, 75 Tex. 800; Erie Dispatch v. Johnson, 87 Tenn. 490; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wynn, 88 Tenn. 820; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 88 Tenn. 490, 7 L. R. A. 162; Black v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 55 Wis. 819; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 41 Ala. 486; Adams Exp. Co. v. Stettin, 61 Ill. 184; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chapman, 183 Ill. 96, 8 L. R. A. 508; Judson v. Western R. Corp. 6 Allen, 486; Orndorff v. Adams Exp. Co. 8 Bush, 194; United States Exp. Co. v. Backman, 38 Ohio St. 144; Lamb v. Camden & A. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 271.

In my opinion, notwithstanding the stipulation in the aforesaid receipt, limiting, to some extent, the liability of the Express Company, the Company was still bound, at its peril, to act in good faith, as towards its employer, and to exercise reasonable care and diligence with respect to its employer's goods. There was ample evidence to show negligence on the part of the Express Company, if not gross negligence. The goods were shipped from Kansas City in good order. When they arrived at their destination, at Lawrence, the box containing them was found broken. With due care, however, they might still have been saved, as is fairly inferable from the evidence, and as was the opinion of the jury according to their findings. The box, however, was turned over by one of the Express Company's agents, and a piece came out. Afterwards the Company's agents attempted to take the box and contents from the express-car in which they were transported, and to put the same on a truck, and in doing so some of the type and some of the electrotyping plates fell down between the car and the platform. Afterwards they gathered them up, and put them into a coal scuttle, and took them to a house belonging to the Express Company, where they remained for some time, and were afterwards removed to the Express Company's office, where they still remain, so far as is shown. This seems like gross negligence. It was not necessary, however, that gross negligence should have been shown. Ordinary negligence only, or, in other words, a want of ordinary care, was all that was necessary.

In the case of Kallman v. United States Exp. Co., supra, the following, among other, language, with reference to express companies limiting their common-law liability, is used: "An examination of the authorities bearing upon this point will, we think, show that they may do so, provided, however, that due care and diligence be used in the discharge of their trust. But carriers cannot in this way shield themselves from the consequences of fraud, gross negligence, and want of care."

It is only when such carriers act in good faith, and use due care and diligence in and about their business, that the law permits them to have the benefit of limitations like that under consideration."

In the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. 12 L. R. A.

Wynn, supra, the following, among other, language is used by the court: "The author of American and English Encyclopædia of Law says: 'By the clear weight of authority in England, Canada, the United States, and almost without exception in the States of the Union, the rule has been adopted that the common carrier can make no contract the effect of which will be to exempt him from liability for negligence.' 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 822. Is the limitation in the contract before us within the prohibition of this eminently just and generally accepted principle? Manifestly the stipulation does not contemplate total exemption from liability; it only provides for partial or limited exemption. Upon that distinction the nice and important question arises, Can a stipulation of the latter character stand before the law when one of the former kind cannot? Or, to state the same question differently, and so as to apply it more directly to the facts of this case, the rule of law being established, as we have seen it is, that the defendant company could not lawfully have contracted with the plaintiff that it would in no event be liable for any part of the value of the mare, if lost or destroyed, Can the limitation of its liability to $100 be upheld in the courts, if it should appear that her death resulted from the negligence of the company, and that she was in fact worth eight times that amount, as the jury found her to be? We unhesitatingly answer, 'No.' The carrier cannot by contract excuse itself from liability for the whole or any part of a loss brought about by its negligence. To our minds, it is perfectly clear that the two kinds of stipulation—that providing for total, and that providing for partial, exemption from liability for the consequences of the carrier's negligence—stand upon the same ground, and must be tested by the same principles. If one can be enforced, the other can; if either be invalid, both must be held to be so,—the same considerations of public policy operating in each case. With great deference for those who may differ with us, we think it entirely illogical and unreasonable to say that the carrier may not absolve itself from liability for the whole value of property lost or destroyed through its negligence, but that it may absolve itself from responsibility for one half, three fourths, seven eighths, nine tenths, or ninety hundredths of the loss so occasioned. With great unanimity the authorities say it cannot do the former. If allowed to do the latter, it may thereby substantially evade and nullify the law, which says it shall not do the former, and in that way do indirectly what it is forbidden to do directly. We hold that it can do neither. The requirement of the law has ever been, and is now, that the common carrier shall be diligent and careful in the transportation of its freight, and public policy forbids that it shall throw off that obligation by stipulation for exemption in whole or in part from the consequences of its negligent acts."

In the case of Southern Exp. Co. v. Seide, supra, the Supreme Court of Mississippi decided as follows: "A stipulation in a receipt given by an express company that, if the value of the goods shipped is not stated by the shipper and specified in the receipt, the holder will not demand more than $50, for loss or damage, exempts the carrier from greater liability only when the loss did not result from negligence on its part. This is true, although a greater charge is made for carrying packages over $50 in value, and the shipper fails to state the value, and pays the minimum charge." Part of syllabus.

In the case of Kirby v. Adams Exp. Co., supra, the Court of Appeals of St. Louis, Mo., decided as follows: "A clause in a contract between an express company and a shipper stated that goods shipped are of the value of $50, unless their value should be inserted in the contract, and that the company, in case of loss, would not be liable for more than $50, unless the value was so inserted, and the value of the goods was not inserted. Held, that this did not relieve the company from liability for the full value of the goods if lost through its fault and that a presumption of negligence arose from the mere fact of loss." Part of syllabus.

In the case of McFadden v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 92 Mo. 848, 10 West. Rep. 372, the Supreme Court of Missouri decided as follows: "While a shipper may release a common carrier from its obligation as an insurer of his property, yet the carrier cannot, by any kind of stipulation, exempt itself from liability for its own negligence." Part of syllabus. See also the other cases above cited, and especially the Pennsylvania cases.

I think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Paul M. BERGER et al., Respts.,

v.

George E. VARRELMANN, Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.

(....N. Y. ....)

1. Findings that a judgment was confessed in contemplation of an assignment for creditors and in fraud of the statute governing such assignments, though classified among conclusions of law, will be given the same effect to uphold the judgment as if they were designated as findings of fact.

2. Lack of knowledge by a creditor on receiving a confession of judgment that his debtor intends immediately to make a general assignment does not exempt the judgment from the provisions of the statute in respect to preferences in such assignments.

3. A confession of judgment made in contemplation of a general assignment for creditors, which immediately follows, must be treated as part of the assignment in respect to prohibited preferences.

(Bradley, Haight and Brown, JJ., dissent.)

NOTE.—Preferences in assignments sanctioned.

A formidable array of authority is cited in support of the proposition that a failing debtor may honestly prefer one creditor above another and apply all of his assets to the payment of one individual creditor, providing the indebtedness is genuine, and the property out of which it is paid no more than sufficient to satisfy. Hill v. Northrop, 9 How. Pr. 524; Hall v. Arnold, 15 Barb. 599; Archer v. O'Brien, 7 Hun. 145; Jewett v. Noteware, 30 Hun. 124; Woodworth v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 8; Carpenter v. Muren, 42 Barb. 300; Leavitt v. Blotchford, 17 N. Y. 521; Williams v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 682, 1 L. ed. 979; Waterbury v. Sturtevant, 18 Wend. 358; Spaulding v. Strang, 37 N. Y. 125; Auburn Exch. Bank v. Fitch, 48 Barb. 344.

A man confessedly in embarrassed circumstances, and, as the result shows, insolvent, seeing that a firm of which he is a member must probably fail, may lawfully appropriate such private property to the payment primarily of his private debts, in preference to the partnership debts, by conveying and transferring his property to his private creditors in payment of their just demands; and such conveyances and transfers will be valid, where there is nothing to impeach the good faith of the grantees, or tending to show that they were privy to any concealment or fraudulent intent or purpose on the part of the grantor, in disposing of his property. Auburn Exch. Bank v. Fitch, supra.

When a debtor is insolvent and knows it, any payment then made by him to a creditor in full must be made with intent to prefer. Driggs v. Moore, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 608, 1 Abb. U. S. 440; Rison v. Knapp, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 849, 1 Dill. 186; Martin v. Toof, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 436; Re Gregg, 1d. 456.

See also 14 L. R. A. 198.

The intentions of parties are to be judged by the legal effect of their acts. Sampson v. Burton, 4 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 1; Campbell v. Traders Nat. Bank of Chicago, 3 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 493.

It is not necessary that there should be an actual intent in the mind of the debtor. The intent may be inferred from circumstances. Linkman v. Wilcox, 1 Dill. 151; Giddings v. Dodd, 1 Dill. 115.

It was well said that the law tolerates assignments giving preferences; it does not favor them. And one inflexible condition of that toleration is, that the debtor shall not reserve by the assignment any benefit or advantage to himself out of the assigned property, either pecuniary, or by coercion of his creditors, or by a control over the disposition of the fund. Even a discretion in the assignees as to the distribution of the fund will vitiate the assignment. Boardman v. Halliday, 10 Paige, 223, 4 L. ed. 963.

This right is unrestrained by statute in New York, except in special instances, and the cases in which it has been decided that a debtor in failing circumstances has a right to prefer one of his creditors to another in the distribution of his estate are very numerous. McMenomy v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Ch. 446, 1 L. ed. 679; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. 571; Wilkes v. Ferris, 5 Johns. 385; Macfie v. Cairns, 3 Cow. 547, affirming Hopk. Ch. 373, 3 L. ed. 455; Wilder v. Winne, 6 Cow. 284; Winteringham v. Lafay, 7 Cow. 736; Handricks v. Walden, 17 Johns. 426; Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns. 453; Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend. 187; Webb v. Daggett, 2 Barb. 9; Brigham v. Tillinghast, 15 Barb. 618; Grant v. Chapman, 33 N. Y. 203; O'Neil v. Salmon, 25 How. Pr. 246; Cram v. Mitchell, 1 Sandf. Ch. 251, 7 L. ed. 318; *Jacobs v. APPEAL by defendant Varrelmann from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term for New York County, which set aside a judgment confessed by W. and H. Erdtmann in favor of appellant. Affirmed.

Statement by Follett, Ch. J.:

From June, 1888, to April 29, 1889, Henry Erdtmann and Gustave Varrelmann were partners engaged in business at Nos. 253 and 254 Pearl Street, New York, under the firm name of "W. & H. Erdtmann." April 29, 1889, they confessed judgment in favor of George E. Varrelmann (the father of Gustave Varrelmann) for $7,824.62, which was entered and docketed in the office of the clerk of the City and County of New York, at twenty-six minutes past twelve o'clock of that day, and on the same afternoon an execution thereon was delivered to the sheriff of that county, who on the same day "levied under such execution upon the entire stock and property of said defendants, Henry Erdtmann and Gustave Varrelmann, in their several places of business, 252 and 254 Pearl Street, and at the warehouse of W. A. Evis & Co., 63 Front Street, in the City of New York." Immediately after the levy of the execution, and on the same day, the defendants therein executed and delivered a general assignment for the benefit of creditors to Clemens J. Kracht, by which their individual property was devoted to the payment of their personal debts, and the surplus, if any, together with the firm property, to the payment of its debts, and the surplus of the firm assets, if any, to the payment of their personal debts (if their individual assets were insufficient for that purpose), according to the interest of each partner. None of their individual creditors were preferred except employes, whose wages were to be first paid. The salaries and wages of the firm employes were directed to be first paid, after which the firm creditors were divided into six classes, which were to be paid in full in their order. April 30 and May 1, 1889, were legal holidays, and the assignment was not recorded until May 2, 1889, at five minutes past nine in the forenoon. At the time judgment was confessed and the assignment executed an action was pending in the supreme court, brought by the plaintiffs herein against the assignors for the recovery of the amount due on their promissory note for $1,000, which fell due April 4, 1889, in which action a judgment was duly entered and docketed at ten o'clock and ten minutes in the forenoon of May 2, 1889, and ten minutes thereafter an execution thereon was duly issued and delivered to said sheriff. May 9, 1889, the sheriff sold, under Varrelmann's execution, all of the property upon which he had levied for $5,877.79, nearly all of which was purchased by the plaintiff in the execution. On the 9th of May, 1889, this action was begun to set aside the judgment so confessed, the execution issued thereon, and for the recovery for the benefit of the assignee, from the defendant George E. Varrelmann, the amount realized upon the sale under the execution, on the ground that the assignors, in contemplation of their general assignment and as a part thereof, in

In many of the States preferential assignments are prohibited by statute, but in none has the rule at common law, as above stated, been denied. Burrill, Assignm. 4th ed. chap. 10; Bishop, Insolvent Debtors, § 159.

That preferences made in contemplation of and with a view to insolvency and an assignment are void, see Doggett v. Herman, 5 McCrary, 290; Burrows v. Lehnendorff, 3 Iowa, 96; Berry v. Cutts, 42 Me. 455; United States v. Griswold, 8 Fed. Rep. 496; Van Patten v. Burr, 52 Iowa, 518; Holt v. Bancroft, 30 Ala. 192; Livermore v. McNair, 34 N. J. Eq. 478; Kellogg v. Root, 23 Fed. Rep. 525; Hahn v. Salmon, 20 Fed. Rep. 801; Perry v. Holden, 33 Pick. 269.

In the State of New York it is provided by special legislative enactment that in all general assignments any preferences therein created shall not be valid except to the amount of one third in value of the assigned estate, etc. The fact of an excess of preference in no way affects the validity of the assignment. It only requires that the preferences shall be reduced pro rata until the same shall not exceed one third of the assigned estate. Stein v. Levy, 55 Hun, 381.

A debtor resident of Illinois, although insolvent or in failing circumstances, may prefer one creditor to the exclusion of others when done in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Tomlinson v. Matthews, 98 Ill. 178; Payne v. Miller, 108 Ill. 442; Eads v. Thompson, 109 Ill. 87; Bean v. Patterson, 122 U. S. 496, 30 L. ed. 1123.

When assignment is general or partial.

The amount of property embraced in, or intended to be conveyed by, an assignment determines its character as being general or partial. A general assignment is understood to import, in its nature, a transfer of all the debtor's property for the benefit of his creditors. The nature of the relation created by insolvency usually requires that the transfer should be of this comprehensive character. "Creditors," observes Chief Justice Marshall in Brashear v. West, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 608, 8 L. ed. 801, "have an equitable claim on all the property of their debtor, and it is his duty, as well as his right, to devote the whole of it to the satisfaction of their claims."

Schedule must accompany the assignment.

If the schedule was a loose, detached sheet of paper, and not annexed to or really a part of the instrument executed and acknowledged before the notary, and was not actually a part of the assignment when executed and acknowledged, but was annexed afterward, such act would make a new deed. Kerobels v. Schloess, 49 How. Pr. 284.

The schedules are to be deemed a part of the assignment, and the insertion of any fraudulent or fictitious indebtedness therein avoids the assignment. Talcott v. Hess, 31 Hun, 232; Terry v. Butler, 43 Barb. 395; Shultz v. Hoagland, 85 N. Y. 464; American Exch. Bank v. Webb, 36 Barb. 291; Frazier v. Truax, 27 Hun, 597; Denton v. Morrel, 43 Hun, 224, 36 N. Y. Week. Dig. 379.

Where judgments are confessed in contemplation of a general assignment for the purpose of evading the Statute restricting preferences, they are void violation of section 80 of the General Assignment Act, as amended in 1887, created a preference for more than one third of the assets of the assignors. The assignee refused to bring the action in his own behalf, and was made a party defendant. The judgment reversed, and which is appealed from, set aside the judgment confessed, the execution issued thereon, the levy and sale made thereunder, and adjudged that George E. Varrelmann pay $5,877.79 (the sum collected on the execution) to the assignee, to be by him distributed according to the terms of the general assignment.

Mr. Rudolph Dulon, for appellant:

The Statute is not intended to regulate the act of the creditor. He may, notwithstanding the Statute, if he does not know that his debtor contemplates making an assignment, take a mortgage, power of attorney to confess judgments, or other security for his debt, in good faith, and enforce the same. And if he procure the preference over the assignment by his own diligence, and without collusion with the debtor, the subsequent assignment will not affect his security.

Horns Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Sanchez, 131 Ill. 835; Preston v. Spaulding, 130 Ill. 208.

White v. Cotehausen, 129 U. S. 848, 32 L. ed. 682, was not a case of a bona fide creditor. In this instance it is of no greater authority than that of the highest court of any State.

Chicago Union Nat. Bank v. Bank of Kansas City, 136 U. S. 228, 34 L. ed. 841.

Had the judgment been taken by defendant as security for a firm debt without knowledge or notice of the insolvency of the partners and and may be set aside. Abegg v. Schwab, 24 N. Y. S. R. 988.

In Moir v. Brown, 14 Barb. 39 (Hand, J.), it was held that the schedule containing a specification of the property concerned would have controlled and limited the general words of the assignment; that such schedule not being annexed, the assignment was inessential, and, as against creditors, did not convey the property to the assignees.

If the assignment contemplated that the schedule of creditors was to be annexed at some future time, it would be fraudulent upon its face, as it would, in effect, reserve to the debtor the right thereafter to designate the persons who should be preferred in the distribution of the assigned property and assets. Kerchels v. Schloss, 49 How. Pr. 284.

Rights must be determined by the assignment.

The assignment must itself fix and determine the rights of creditors in the assigned property, and not reserve to the assignors the power of substantially doing so. Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470; Sheldon v. Dodge, 4 Dento, 220.

The reason why the reservation of such power in the assignors is fraudulent is obvious. The debtor, in such an assignment, puts his property beyond the reach of his creditors, and yet reserves the right to control the manner of its distribution among them. This is a violation of the Statute, which declares assignments made with intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors to be void. The intent of the debtor cannot be considered other than it appears in the instrument. The law pronounces such reservation of power in the debtor fraudulent. Kerchels v. Schloss, 49 How. Pr. 284.

Where an assignment directed the assignees to pay the debts specified in the schedules annexed thereto, according to the priority of several schedules, and provided that such schedules should be made within sixty days, and be annexed to, and form a part of the assignment, but did not prescribe what debts should be inserted in the respective schedules, or in what order they should be arranged therein, the preparation of such schedules being left entirely to the discretion of the assignors; and it appeared that such schedules had not been made out and annexed to the assignment previous to its execution, but that they were prepared by the assignors and annexed at some subsequent time,—it was held that the assignment was fraudulent and void. Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470.

Although a judgment by confession is to a certain extent founded on the agreement of the parties, instead of a direct adjudication by the court, it is none the less, on that account, a judicial act. And since their contract cannot create a jurisdiction in excess or contravention of that conferred by law, it is equally essential to the validity of a judgment of this character as to any other that it be entered in a court having jurisdiction of the subject matter. And it is to have all the incidents and consequences of any other judgment, and to have the sanction of the law and the authority of the court behind it, it will be invalid unless the court where it is entered might lawfully have rendered the same judgment in a contested action. Lanning v. Carpenter, 23 Barb. 402; 1 Black. Judgm. § 53.

A judgment by confession is not an absolute nullity, if it is valid as to any person. And as long as it remains unvacated, and in apparent force upon the records of the court, it cannot be impeached collaterally. Sheldon v. Stryker, 34 Barb. 116.

The Supreme Court of Iowa held that a judgment confessed under a power which does not comply with statutory requirements is a nullity. Edgar v. Greer, 10 Iowa, 379.

A judgment upon confession, founded on a statement of facts which is defective or insufficient to answer the requirements of the statute, will nevertheless be valid and effectual as between the parties to it, though voidable at the instance of other creditors. Coolbaugh v. Roemer, 30 Minn. 424; Miller v. Earle, 24 N. Y. 110; Neusbaum v. Keim, 24 N. Y. 336; Kirby v. Fitzgerald, 31 N. Y. 417; Bryan v. Miller, 28 Mo. 32, 75 Am. Dec. 107; How v. Dorschheimer, 31 Mo. 348; Lee v. Figg, 37 Cal. 223, 90 Am. Dec. 271; Pond v. Davenport, 44 Cal. 431; Plummer v. Douglas, 14 Iowa, 60, 51 Am. Dec. 436. See also Shadrack v. Woolfolk, 23 Gratt. 707; 1 Black. Judgm. § 68.

The statutes require a person confessing a judgment to file a written statement, signed and sworn to, designating the amount for which the judgment is to be entered, and "stating concisely the facts out of which the indebtedness arose." Winnebrenner v. Edgerton, 30 Barb. 185; Lanning v. Carpenter, 20 N. Y. 447.

The designation of the amount of the debt is a vital part of a valid confession; it must be set forth explicitly and not be left to inference, and the omission of it is a fatal defect. Clements v. Gerow, 30 Barb. 325.

The case last cited contains an admirable statement of the rules that should govern the judgments by confession. See opinion by Hogeboom, J.; notes to Powell v. Kelly (Ga.) 3 L. R. A. 139, and Milliken v. Hathaway (Mass.) 1 L. R. A. 510.

of their intent to make an assignment, it would have been valid in his hands.

Heineman v. Hart, 55 Mich. 64.

The New York Statute (Laws 1877, chap. 466), describes the instrument of assignment, and by chap. 508, Laws 1887, forbids any preference "created" in the general assignment beyond the limit therein mentioned.

To hold that under this Statute the preference forbidden need not be "in the assignment" requires a far more liberal construction than to hold under the Illinois Statute, which does not prescribe the form of the assignment, that such assignment may be divided into several parts, and that several contemporaneous parts or transfers may constitute one assignment.

See Gwynne v. Burnell, 7 Clark & F. 572; Jones v. Smart, 1 T. R. 44.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania holds a preference made by an independent act before the assignment, though in contemplation thereof, to be valid because not in the assignment.

The appellant is protected by the Statute which authorized him to obtain a judgment by confession.

Trier v. Herman, 115 N. Y. 163; 1 Black, Judgm. § 293.

Mr. Frederic W. Hinrichs, for respondent:

The facts of this case offer abundant ground for setting aside the judgment and for having the assets which were levied upon by the defendant George E. Varrelmann (or their proceeds) paid to the defendant Kracht for distribution under the terms of the assignment deed.

A finding, although in form classified as a finding of law, may, in effect, be a finding of fact, and for the purpose of upholding the judgment should be so regarded.

Adams v. Fitzpatrick, 125 N. Y. 124; Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y. 617.

The statute is remedial and was intended to supply a defect in the existing law and to suppress a mischief. It should therefore be construed liberally to accomplish the manifest intention of the Legislature.

Under the Missouri statute it was held that judgments confessed immediately before the execution of the general assignment, and alleged to be parts of the same transaction, constituted together one voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, under which all the creditors were entitled to share alike.

Clapp v. Nordmeyer, 25 Fed. Rep. 71.

A like ruling was made in Maine.

Berry v. Cutsa, 42 Me. 445.

The same is true of Alabama.

A like rule was enforced in Iowa.

It is of no consequence what intention appellant had in accepting the preference. It is sufficient if the debtor unlawfully intended to violate the law in confessing the judgment.

Spelman v. Freedman, 54 Hun, 414; Wilcox v. Payne, 28 N. Y. S. R. 712.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment which the appellant obtained by the confession of his debtors is sought to be set aside, and the money collected by virtue of it recovered for the benefit of the creditors of the judgment debtor, on the ground that, when confessed, the confessors intended to make a general assignment and prefer the claim of the appellant through a judgment and execution, and thereby evade the prohibition of the 30th section of the Assignment Act, which is as follows: "Sec. 30. In all general assignments of the estates of debtors for the benefit of creditors hereafter made, any preference created therein (other than for the wages or salaries of employes under chapter 328 of the Laws of 1884, and chapter 283 of the Laws of 1886), shall not be valid except to the amount of one third in value of the assigned estate left after deducting such wages or salaries and the costs and expenses of executing such trust; and should said one third of the assets of the assignor or assignors be insufficient to pay in full the preferred claims to which, under the provisions of this section, the same are applicable, then said assets shall be applied to the payment of the same pro rata to the amount of each said preferred claims." Laws 1887, chap. 508.

The appellant insists that his judgment and execution by which he secured more than one third of the estate of the insolvent debtors are not brought within the prohibition of this section, because: (1) the trial court did not find as a fact that the debtors contemplated making a general assignment when the judgment was confessed: (2) the trial court did not find as a fact that the appellant knew, when he received the confession of judgment and seized the property by virtue of the execution issued thereon, that the debtors contemplated making a general assignment; (3) the preference was not created in the general assignment, but by a separate instrument.

Before this section was added, in 1887, to the General Assignment Act of this State, the practice which had become so prevalent that it may be said to have become a custom for failing debtors to devote, by general assignment, the whole or a large part of their estates to the payment of a few preferred creditors, often near relatives, resulted in so much hardship and injustice that the section above quoted was adopted to mitigate the evils arising from the practice. The section being remedial, should be liberally construed so as to prevent the mischiefs at which it was aimed. White v. Cotzhausen, 120 U. S. 329, 83 L. ed. 677; Hulder v. Golden, 86 N. Y. 448; Hart v. Cleis, 8 Johns. 41.

The trial court found that the estate of the assignors was not worth three times the amount of the appellant's judgment, and that its collection consumed more than one third of it, and that when the judgment was confessed, execution issued and levied and the assignment executed, the assignors and George E. Varrelmann all knew that the sale under the execution to be issued would absorb more than one third of the debtors' assets. The decision signed by the trial judge contains seventeen findings of fact and seven conclusions of law. The first and second of the latter are as follows:

"1. The judgment confessed in favor of the defendant George E. Varrelmann, and the execution and levy which followed, were made by the defendants Henry Erdtmann and Gustave Varrelmann, in contemplation of their general assignment and as part thereof, and for the purpose of preferring said defendant, George E. Varrelmann, in whose favor the said judgment was confessed by them, out of their property, for more than one third of the net assets of the said defendants, Henry Erdtmann and Gustave Varrelmann, and to prevent the said assets from going into the hands of the defendant Kracht, as assignee, and being distributed to the plaintiffs and the other creditors of the said defendants Henry Erdtmann and Gustave Varrelmann, pursuant to the terms of their general assignment deed.

"2. Said confession of judgment and the execution and levy which followed were made in fraud of the said general assignment, and are void, and should be set aside and vacated, and the assets levied upon, or the entire proceeds thereof should be paid the defendant Kracht, as assignee, to be distributed pursuant to the terms of the deed of general assignment."

The learned counsel for the appellant insists that these conclusions cannot be given the effect of findings of fact, but must be held to be conclusions of law, and that the facts so found cannot be considered on this appeal. This contention is not well founded, for it is well settled that though a "finding of fact" be called a "conclusion of law" and improperly classified as such in the decision signed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1022), it will, for the purpose of upholding a judgment, be given the same effect as though embraced within and designated as one of the findings of fact. Parker v. Baxter, 86 N. Y. 586; Murray v. Marshal, 94 N. Y. 611; Adams v. Fitzpatrick, 125 N. Y. 124.

The facts found in the conclusions of law above quoted—that the assignors confessed the judgment in contemplation of making a general assignment as a part thereof, and for the purpose of preferring George E. Varrelmann for more than one third of their estate, that the confession of judgment, the execution and levy were made in fraud of the general assignment—will be given the same force in support of this judgment as though they had been properly classified in the decision signed.

It would not be claimed, we think, that a preference for more than one third of the assigned estate, when created by an instrument known as a general assignment, would be valid, though executed without the knowledge of the preferred creditors. If such a position could be successfully maintained, the section would be wholly inoperative, as it would be quite easy, as, indeed, it is frequently the practice, to execute those instruments without consulting the favored creditors. If the absence of pre-knowledge on the part of the creditors that a preference is to be created by an assignment does not strengthen their position, it is not easy to see how the want of knowledge that an assignment is contemplated would avail them, though the preference be created by an independent instrument. This section is designed to limit the power of insolvents to create preferences beyond the extent named, and to regulate their conduct, but not to control the action of creditors, who are left free to collect or secure their claims by the usual remedies. It is the action of the insolvent debtors which the law seeks to control. Home Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Sanchez, 131 Ill. 830.

The only remaining question is whether a preference by insolvents not created in or by a general assignment, but by a separate instrument and in contemplation of making a general assignment, is prohibited by the Statute.

We are asked to construe the language: "In all general assignments of the estates of debtors for the benefit of creditors hereafter made, any preferences made therein . . . shall not be valid, except," etc.—closely, and hold that preferences not created in instruments known as general assignments are not within the condemnation of the section. Such an interpretation would defeat the intent of the Legislature, and the Statute would be found to be no bar to the practices at which it was aimed. Insolvents would be left free to secure their friends by independent instruments, executed in contemplation of making general assignments, which, when executed, would carry to their assignees but a remnant of their estates, for the benefit of their unfavored creditors. The words of the section must be construed to embrace all of the instrumentalities which failing debtors, in contemplation of a general assignment, voluntarily employ to give preferences to particular creditors. As was said by Finch, J., in Richardson v. Thurber, 104 N. Y. 610, 6 Cent. Rep. 799: "The word 'assignment' may sometimes have reference to the instrument which affects the transfer and some-times to the transfer itself, considered as a legal fact or result."

The section under consideration was intended to prevent the forbidden result whether accomplished within or without the general assignment. This question has been several times before the supreme court in this State, and conveyances which created preferences for more than one third of the insolvent's estate, when made in contemplation of a general assignment, have invariably been condemned as violations of the Statute. Manning v. Beck, 54 Hun, 102; Spelman v. Freedman, Id. 409; Sweetser v. Smith, 5 N. Y. Supp. 878; Spelman v. Jaffray, 6 N. Y. Supp. 570; Kemp v. Drucker, Id. 945; Abegg v. Schwab, 24 N. Y. S. R. 986; Wilcox v. Payne, 28 N. Y. 712.

The question has also been considered by the courts of other States under similar statutes, forbidding or regulating preferences in voluntary or general assignments for the benefit of creditors.

In Illinois the Act is entitled "An Act Concerning Voluntary Assignments, and Conferring Jurisdiction upon County Courts, Approved May 22, 1877," and contains fourteen sections. The first prescribes the mode in which assignments shall be executed and is, in part, as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly, that in all cases of voluntary assignments hereafter made for the benefit of creditors, the debtor or debtors shall annex to such assignment an inventory," etc.

The succeeding eleven sections prescribe the power and duties of assignees and the procedure by which voluntary assignments are to be carried into effect. The 14th section confers jurisdiction upon the county courts to carry out the provisions of the Act. The thirteenth section provides: "Sec. 13. Every provision in any assignment hereafter made in this State providing for the payment of one debt or liability in preference to another shall be void, and all debts and liabilities within the provisions of the assignment shall be paid pro rata from the assets thereof."

The question has several times arisen whether preferences created, not in a voluntary assignment, but by instruments executed at about the same time and in contemplation of making a general assignment, were within the Statute. In Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208, the insolvents preferred certain of their creditors by confessing judgments, and on the same day that their general assignment for the benefit of creditors was made. The point was taken that the Statute made void only preferences in the general assignment, and not those otherwise given. In discussing this question it was said: "We hold that it is within the spirit and intent of the Statute that when a debtor has formed a determination to voluntarily dispose of his whole estate, and has entered upon that determination, it is immaterial into how many parts the performance or execution of his determination may be broken, the law will regard all his acts, having for their object and effect the disposition of his estate, as parts of a single transaction, and on the execution of a formal assignment it will, under the Statute, draw to it, and the law will regard as embraced within its provisions all prior acts of the debtor having for their object and purpose the voluntary transfer or disposition of his estate to or for creditors, and if any preferences are shown to have been made or given by the debtor to one creditor over another in such disposition of his estate, full effect will be given to the assignment, and such preference will, in a court of equity, be declared void, and set aside as in fraud of the statute."

This doctrine has been approved in subsequent cases in that State, and also in the Supreme Court of the United States in White v. Cotzhausen, 129 U. S. 329, 32 L. ed. 637, which arose under the Illinois Statute. In that case an insolvent debtor, by deeds, bills of sale and warrants for the confession of judgments, disposed of all his property for the benefit of his brothers and sisters, who were creditors, but made no general assignment. In an action brought in the circuit court of the United States to set aside the conveyances as violations of the thirteenth section of the Voluntary Assignment Act, it was held that it was quite immaterial that no general assignment had been executed, but that any preference, however created, by an insolvent while engaged in making a complete disposition of his property, was forbidden and void under the Act. The judgment of the circuit court was placed in part upon the ground that the conveyances and confessions of judgment were "made without adequate consideration and with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the appellee Cotzhausen" (p. 388), the complaining creditor, but the judgment of the supreme court was not rested upon that ground. It was said: "We have already seen that the circuit court proceeded upon the ground that the conveyances, bill of sale, confessions of judgment and transfers by Alex. White, Jr., were made without adequate consideration and with intent to hinder, delay and defraud the appellee. Upon these grounds it gave him a prior right in the disposition of the property. We are not able to assent to this determination of the rights of the parties; for the mother, sisters and brother of Alex. White, Jr., were his creditors, and, so far as the record discloses, they only sought to obtain a preference over other creditors" (page 344).

The reference to White v. Cotzhausen, must not be taken as an indication of approval, nor this cautionary remark as an intimation that we disapprove of the doctrine that when an insolvent, without making a general assignment, transfers his entire estate to favored creditors by several instruments, it is a violation of the section, but the case is instructive in its reasoning, and shows the trend of courts when called upon to consider like statutes. In this State the supreme court (Stein v. Levy, 55 Hun, 881), one judge dissenting, has declined to follow the doctrine of the case cited to its logical conclusion. In Pennsylvania it has been held (Lake Shore Bkq. Co. v. Fuller, 110 Pa. 156, 1 Cent. Rep. 109), that a confession of judgment to a bona fide creditor by an insolvent, on the eve of making a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, is not a violation of the Statute which forbids preferences in assignments; but in most of the States the construction which we have indicated prevails.

Thus far this case has been considered upon the theory that the appellant had no knowledge when he took his confession of judgment that his confessors contemplated making a general assignment, and we think it might well be decided upon that theory. But it is urged by some of our brethren that, there being no express finding of fact that the appellant knew that the judgment debtors intended to make an assignment when the confession was taken, his judgment should not be set aside, but allowed to stand as a valid preference to the extent of one third of the estate of the assignors. We think a sufficient answer to this suggestion is that the appellant makes no such claim, but from the first to the last he has planted himself upon the ground that in the absence of an explicit finding that he knew that a general assignment was intended he is entitled to sustain his judgment and retain the whole sum collected thereby. No such question was raised at special term, at the general term, nor is it suggested in his brief on this appeal.

There is a further answer to this position: as before stated, the record before us contains none of the evidence. "Where the evidence given on a trial is not contained in the case on appeal to this court, it must be assumed that the facts proved were sufficient to sustain the findings; and also to sustain any additional findings required to support the conclusions of law not in conflict with the affirmative facts found." Gardner v. Schwab, 110 N. Y. 650; Murray v. Marshall, 94 N. Y. 611, 617; Reese v. Reese, Id. 623; Kellogg v. Thompson, 66 N. Y. 88; First Nat. Bank of Champlain v. Wood, 45 Hun, 413; Bond v. Bond, 51 Hun, 507.

An assumption that George E. Varrelmann knew that the judgment debtors contemplated a general assignment is not in conflict with any of the affirmative facts found, nor is it in conflict with any facts which the court refused to find. As before stated, the court found as facts that "said confession of judgment and the execution and levy which followed were made in fraud of said general assignment." The judgment by confession was the joint act of the judgment debtors and of the judgment creditor, which is found to have been made in fraud of the assignment. Issuing the execution, causing a levy and sale to be made, were the individual acts of George E. Varrelmann, which the court found were in fraud of the assignment. These facts so expressly found, with the other significant facts found and admitted by the answers, to wit: the relationship existing between the parties, that the assignment, the confession of judgment and the issuing of the execution and levy thereunder, were concurrent acts performed on the same afternoon, taken in connection with the knowledge of Varrelmann that his judgment, execution and levy would absorb much more than one third of the assets of the firm, seem to us to require this court, under the rule laid down, to infer, in support of this judgment, which is so apparently an equitable one, that George E. Varrelmann knew, when he took his judgment and made his levy, that his son and the partner of his son then contemplated making a general assignment. If he was not aware of their purpose, it is quite singular that the steps which he took were so timely and happily taken as to accomplish the absorption of the entire assets of the assignors. We think these various proceedings were not the result of accident, but of design. This judgment, confessed in fraud of the assignment, cannot be regarded as part of it, for both parties to the judgment say it was not so intended; but if it could be, it may be cut down by any act of the assignors which would invalidate a general assignment, and the fraud of the assignors, though not participated in by those benefited, avoids a general assignment. Loos v. Wilkinson, 110 N. Y. 195, 1 L. R. A. 250.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except Bradley, Haight and Brown, JJ., dissenting.

Bradley, Haight and Brown, JJ., dissenting:

We are unable to concur with the majority of the court. The record does not contain the evidence. And the facts found do not warrant the conclusion that the appellant took the judgment by confession otherwise than in good faith for a valid debt, and without any knowledge or information that the debtors contemplated making an assignment for the benefit of their creditors.

In that view no reason appears to us for setting aside the judgment, and it is the right of the creditor to retain it, as it was to take it pursuant to the Statute providing for that method of taking judgments. But, inasmuch as the confession of it was made by the judgment debtors in contemplation on their part of the general assignment which was soon after made by them, and treating it as part of the scheme or transaction of their assignment; so far as they were concerned, the sale on the execution of the judgment was properly set aside and direction given for the payment of the proceeds of the sale to the assignee for distribution in execution of his trust. In that view the creditor taking the judgment should not be denied entirely the benefit of the preference which it and the levy of his execution apparently gave him, but he should at least be treated as a preferred creditor, and the amount of one third of the estate of the assignors left after making the deduction directed by the Statute, should, treating him as such, be applied pro rata amongst the preferred creditors as their rights in that respect may appear. Otherwise his means as such judgment creditor to realize anything upon his debt may be entirely defeated. And the rule adopted that the judgment in such case be set aside may well have the effect to discourage the taking of judgments by confession, as perchance it may be followed by a general assignment of a debtor making such confession. It would seem to bring such case, more in accordance with principle to set aside the assignment as well as the judgment confessed rather than to set aside the latter and permit the former to stand; and such discrimination against the judgment creditor cannot properly be made unless he is chargeable with a fraudulent intent as against the creditors of his judgment debtor in taking his judgment.

Our conclusion is that unless the plaintiffs stipulate to modify the judgment as above suggested the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event, and in case they do so stipulate the judgment be modified accordingly without costs.

1. Proof as to the value of the property may be required before the entry of judgment in favor of plaintiff after a default by defendant in an action to recover damages for the conversion of personal property.
2. No notice need be given of a motion by an amicus curie to dismiss an action as fictitious.
3. An action commenced by collusion without any real controversy will be dismissed.
4. A judgment by default and the assignment thereof to a stranger will not prevent dismissal of a collusive suit.
5. A conversation in the presence of an attorney is not a privileged communication in an action between the parties thereto.
6. Communications to an attorney acting as the agent of both parties to a controversy are not privileged in an action between such parties.
7. Failure to demand a jury is a waiver of the right to a jury trial.
8. An attorney as amicus curie may move to dismiss an action as collusive and it is his duty to do so if he knows or has reason to believe that the action is fictitious.

NOTE.—What is collusion.

Collusion is where two persons, apparently in a hostile position, or having conflicting interests, by arrangement do some act in order to injure a third person or to deceive a court. Thus, where a person brought an action for penalties against a company by arrangement with them, for the purpose of protecting them against other actions by hostile persons for the same penalties, it was held that the judgment was obtained by collusion. Girdlestone v. Brighton Aquarium Co. L. R. 3 Exch. Div. 187, L. R. 4 Exch. Div. 107.

The effect of collusion is to vitiate the transaction in which it is employed. Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. title Collusion.

Where the tendency of an agreement is to interest a husband in procuring a divorce or in foregoing resistance to an effort by his wife to that end, then it is contrary to public policy, and is void. *Everhart v. Sound policy as well as established law forbids it, and any agreement made in fraud of the purposes of the law, and against its policy, is illegal and void. Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 635 et seq.; 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 760; Speck v. Dausman, 7 Mo. App. 165.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Eureka County dismissing his action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain personal property. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Wren & Cheney for appellant.

Messrs. Baker & Wines for respondents.

Murphy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case came before this court on appeal from an order of the district court, setting aside the default of the defendants. The order was reversed, and the cause remanded. 20 Nev. 410. It is unnecessary to repeat the history of the case here. On the return of the case to the district court, the plaintiff, by his attorney, appeared in court, and asked for judgment on the pleadings for the full amount prayed for in the complaint, no answer having been filed; which motion was by the court denied, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment without proof of the value of the property alleged to have been converted. In an action arising upon contract, for the recovery of money or damages only, a default and final judgment may be entered by the clerk. In all other cases the plaintiff must apply to the verses only; and hence, a bringing of fictitious action involving fictitious issue has always been considered a contempt of court. Smith v. Brown, 3 Tex. 260.

And where it appears that the only object of the action was to determine the legality of a certain stock issue, in which the alleged controversy was purely fictitious, the institution of such a suit was held to be a contempt of court. Haskett v. State, 51 Ind. 178.

A familiar application of the rule occurs in cases where an action is brought for the recovery of property in custodia legis. It is well settled that in bringing such an action the party plaintiff incurs the penalties incident to contempt. Huntington v. McMahon, 48 Conn. 174.

A fictitious suit, or a feigned issue, or a suit instituted by persons to try the rights of third persons, not parties to the record, is a contempt of court, and will be dismissed on motion (Hoskins v. Berkeley, 4 T. R. 402; 3 Bl. Com. 452; Re Elsom, 8 Barn. & C. 597, 2 Inst. 215; Brewster v. Kitchin, Comb. 425; Coxe v. Phillips, Cas. t. Harw. 287; Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 147, 148, 3 L. ed. 181); and any person as amicus curie may make the motion. Rex v. Vaux, Comb. 13; Dove v. Martin, Id. 169; Doe v. Walker, 2 Show. 403; Coxe v. Phillips, supra.

A suit may be shown to be fictitious, either by inspection of the record or by evidence alunde, or by both. See cases supra.

court for the relief prayed for in his complaint, and when he does so the court may require additional proof, and it is not error for the court to refuse to enter judgment on the pleadings alone, and the proof must be made when demanded. Parker v. Wardner (Idaho) 13 Pac. Rep. 178.

G. W. Baker, as an officer of the court, and as amicus curie, submitted a written motion to the court "to dismiss the action as to all the defendants, except the Eureka County Bank, upon the ground and for the reason that the same was and is a sham action, colorably instituted between the plaintiff and the defendants Sadler, Torre, Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, without any intention of ever determining any dispute, or litigating any question, or ever having any adversary trial, but simply to obtain the judgment and decision of the court upon a feigned issue, which might affect other parties not impleaded; and that said action between the parties last above mentioned was amicably instituted, without any real dispute between them, and their interest in the question when the said suit was brought was one and the same, and not adverse. That in these proceedings the plaintiff and said defendants mentioned were seeking to secure such a judgment to be entered as might result to the advantage of the defendants, with reference to the title of the property mentioned in the complaint, and adversely to the interest of other parties not before the court, and who had no knowledge of the suit, and no opportunity to be heard, and have any interest they might have in the subject matter of the suit determined. That the attorney for the plaintiff, who brought the action for the defendants last above mentioned, was employed and paid by them, and such suit was simply a scheme to in some way obtain a judgment of the court upon a feigned issue, which it was conceived might be of advantage to the defendants, and for which purpose the plaintiff permitted his name to be used in instituting the same." In support of this motion, the amicus curie offered the affidavits of Sadler and Rives, and it was stipulated between the parties that the testimony taken on the hearing of the motion to open the default should be considered admitted as evidence on the hearing of this motion, in so far as the same was applicable. The plaintiff objected to the consideration of the motion, upon the ground that the same had not been noticed. The court permitted the motion and affidavits to be filed, and informed the plaintiff that he might have all the time he required to prepare counter-affidavits and argue said motion. The plaintiff denied the right of counsel to make the motion, and excepted to the ruling of the court.

The objection of the plaintiff to the filing and hearing of the motion to dismiss, on the ground that the same was not noticed, is without merit: (1) Because upon the reading and filing of the motion the court informed counsel for plaintiff that they should have all the time they desired to file counter-affidavits and argue the motion, which offer they declined to avail themselves of, but stipulated that the affidavits, submitted to the court on the consideration of the motion to open up the default, on the former hearing of this case, should be admitted as the evidence on this motion, in so far as the same was pertinent to the question submitted for decision. And (2) a motion of this character is in the nature of a suggestion to the court that the action then pending is not a real, but a fictitious, one, to obtain a judgment of the court, not upon any issue then involved between the parties to the action, but that might be used by either the plaintiff or the defendants against strangers to the action who might thereafter come in and claim an interest in the property sued for. When actions are brought in a court of law, a duty devolves upon the judge, and that is scrupulously to guard its proceedings from being used by the parties collusively, and not suffer a judgment to be entered without being fully satisfied that a cause of action really exists as provided for by law. Whenever facts are placed before a court, which cause any suspicion that there is any collusion between the parties, no matter in what way or form the facts are brought to the knowledge of the court, it is the duty of the judge at once to institute such an examination as will satisfy him of the truth or falsity of the charge.

There are many circumstances connected with this case which certainly give a strange appearance to the mode in which this action was commenced and has been prosecuted, sufficient, in our opinion, to sustain the order of dismissal. It appears from the uncontradicted testimony that one Townshend had a contract from the government of the United States mail from Eureka, in Eureka County, to Pioche, in Lincoln County, all in this State. He was in possession of horses, wagons and harness sufficient to stock the route. R. Sadler and John Torre were his bondsmen. Townshend became indebted to the Eureka County Bank in the sum of "$4,800, to Torre, Sadler, and Barbieri in the sum of $2,000, and there was still due to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company the sum of $2,000 balance of purchase money for the stock on the road,—making a total indebtedness of $8,800." The Eureka County Bank insisting upon the payment of its claim, Townshend, on the 11th day of March, 1887, sold and delivered to the Bank all the property used in transporting said mail, and his interest in the said contract with the government. That the said Sadler, Torre and Barbieri, in order to protect themselves from loss, upon the failure of the parties to carry said mail in accordance with the contract for which they were bondsmen, with the knowledge and consent of Townshend, purchased the property and contract from the Eureka County Bank, paying therefor the sum of $4,800. They also assumed the indebtedness due from Townshend to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company. That after the purchase of said property by Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri they organized the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, and they subscribed for and owned all the stock. That in order to qualify Thomas E. Haley, the parties above named gratuitously transferred to him twenty-five shares of the capital stock of said company, and made him secretary thereof. The Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company setting up its claim to the property, R. Sadler purchased all the right, title and interest of the said Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, for himself, Torre, Barbieri and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, agreeing to give notes signed by himself, Torre and Barbieri for the sum of $2,000. When the time came for the giving of said notes, Torre was absent from Eureka, and the notes of Sadler, Haley and Jackson were offered in lieu thereof; but the same were not accepted by the company, and they were returned to the makers thereof, and the notes of Sadler, Torre and Barbieri were made, and accepted by the company, and, through the advice of Henry Rives, the title of the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company was taken in the name of Haley, for the purpose of commencing a suit and clearing the title to the property, which was to be done for the use and benefit of Sadler, Torre and Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, but that the said Haley never bargained for, purchased, or paid one dollar for said property, and only received the legal title to said property at the request of Sadler, and with the express understanding and agreement that he was in all things to be governed by the advice of the said Henry Rives, and that, if a suit was to be instituted, it was to be conducted in a friendly manner, and under the control of the defendants, and in their interests, and, when the title thereto was settled, to convey all of said property to the said Sadler, Torre and Barbieri, or to any person whom they might designate. This suit for conversion was commenced by the plaintiff while he was acting as secretary of a corporation, against the corporation and three of the stockholders. The defendants Sadler, Torre and Barbieri employed and paid the fees of the attorney for the plaintiff and all the costs of court. Haley testified, and denied that there was any agreement between himself, Sadler, Torre and Barbieri that a judgment should not be taken against the defendants Sadler, Torre, Barbieri and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company; or that the suit should be a friendly one, and should inure to the use and benefit of the defendants above named. He admits that Sadler first spoke to him about purchasing the title of the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company; admits the giving of the notes of Sadler, his own and Jackson's, and the return of them to him; admits that he never paid any money whatever for the property, but says he expected to pay his notes. But they were returned to him, and Sadler, Torre and Barbieri gave notes, and paid them as they became due. They had prior thereto paid the Eureka County Bank the sum of $4,800, and had been in possession of all the property.

The evidence was sufficient to satisfy the court that there was collusion between the plaintiff and the three defendants named, and that the action was not commenced for the purpose of settling any real controversy then existing between the parties. In the case of Brewington v. Lowe, 1 Ind. 28, the supreme court said: "We think these proceedings were instituted under a mistaken apprehension of the proper function of the judiciary. Courts of justice are established to try questions pertaining to the rights of individuals. An action is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is one's due, or a legal demand of one's rights. . . . Indeed, it is well settled that courts will not take cognizance of fictitious suits, instituted merely to obtain judicial opinions upon points of law." In the case of Loughhead v. Bartholomew, reported in Wright (Ohio), 91, Lane, J., said: "Courts are instituted to try questions pertaining to the real interests of individuals; to settle substantial controversies; to preserve the peace of society; and where questions submitted to their action are merely questions of speculation, and where their discussion is contra bonos mores, or against public policy, or where the inquiry tends to cast ridicule upon the court, or where the investigation is palpably injurious to the interests or feelings of third persons, without affecting the substantial rights of the litigants, some means will be found to arrest the inquiry."

In the case of Lord v. Veazie, 49 U. S. 8 How. 255, 13 L. ed. 1069, Taney, Ch. J., said: "It is the office of courts of justice to decide the rights of persons and of property, when the persons interested cannot adjust them by agreement between themselves, and to do this upon the full hearing of both parties. And any attempt, by a mere colorable dispute, to obtain the opinion of the court upon a question of law which a party desires to know for his own interest or his own purposes, when there is no real and substantial controversy between those who appear as adverse parties to the suit, is an abuse which courts of justice have always reprehended, and treated as punishable contempt of court. . . . The objection in the case before us is not that the proceedings were amicable, but that there is no real conflict of interest between them; and that the plaintiff and defendant have the same interest, and that interest adverse, and in conflict with the interest of third persons. . . . A judgment entered under such circumstances, and for such purposes, is a mere form. The whole proceeding was in contempt of the court, and highly reprehensible, and the learned district judge, who was then holding the court, undoubtedly suffered the judgment pro forma to be entered under the impression that there was in fact a controversy between the plaintiff and defendant, and that they were proceeding to obtain a decision upon a disputed question of law, in which they had adverse interests. A judgment in form, thus procured, in the eye of the law, is no judgment of the court. It is a nullity, and no writ of error will lie upon it. This writ is therefore dismissed."

In Smith v. Junction R. Co., 29 Ind. 546, a fictitious name was used for plaintiff in the action. The testimony shows that the name of Smith, instead of Reeder, was more by accident than intentional. But the court did not dismiss the appeal on that ground, but that the interests of Reeder and the railroad company were not antagonistic, and the decision was intended to affect third persons. See also Hotchkiss v. Jones, 4 Ind. 360. The case of Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 68 U. S. 1 Black, 425, 17 L. ed. 93, was a real action. The plaintiff had judgment. Thereafter defendant purchased the plaintiff's judgment, and perfected an appeal to the supreme court. These facts were called to the attention of the court. Mr. Justice Grier said: "This appeal must be dismissed. Selah Chamberlain is, in fact, both appellant and appellee. By the intervention of a friend, he has purchased the debt demanded by Cleveland in his bill and now carries on a pretended controversy by counsel, chosen and paid by himself, and on a record selected by them, for the evident purpose of obtaining a decision injurious to the rights and interest of third parties."

In the case of Berks County v. Jones, 21 Pa. 416, Black, Oh. J., speaking for the court, said: "Without a doubt the object of the proceeding was not to settle a real dispute, but merely to ascertain the law; in other words, to make the court act as counsel for the commissioners. But they have no right to get advice in this way. Courts ought to encourage amicable submissions of real disputes, but people have no right to propound abstract questions to them. For this there is not only the clearest reason, but the highest authority. . . . The judge of the common pleas, over-indulgent to the parties, decided the law for them, when he might have stricken the case from the record. With an easy good nature, equally inexcusable, we have done the same thing. We have considered the subject with as much care as if it had been regularly before us, and we unanimously agree in pronouncing the opinion of the court below to be a perfectly sound exposition of the law. But, because there was nothing on which a judgment could be entered, the writ of error must be quashed." Pittsburgh v. Allegheny, 1 Pittsb. Rep. 99.

In the case of Meeker v. Straat, 38 Mo. App. 242, the supreme court said: "This decree cannot stand. Suits contemplate adversary parties, although amicable suits may be brought to determine the respective rights of the parties thereto. When a suit is brought with a view of affecting the rights of third parties, and it is apparent that that is its sole object, the suit ceases to be adversary, and becomes collusive. No court should lend its aid to such a proceeding. least of all a court of equity. . . . All these considerations lead to the inevitable conclusion that the decree in the present case was unwarranted by the law and the evidence, and that the trial court, instead of rendering a decree for plaintiff, should have dismissed her bill. Judgment reversed, and bill dismissed."

Courts of justice are established for the purpose of deciding really existing questions of rights between parties who in good faith submit a case to the court for a decision and the court should not try an action upon a feigned issue, or an abstract question of law, or judicial practice, not arising out of circumstances really existing, in which the parties have a legal interest. An action is a legal prosecution by a party complainant against a party defendant, to obtain the judgment of the court in relation to some rights claimed to be secured, or some remedy claimed to be given by law to the party complaining. It is given by law, for the recovery of that which is one's due, or a legal demand of one's rights. From the evidence in this case we are satisfied that, at the time of commencing this action, the plaintiff had no legal demand against the defendants, and they did not infringe upon any of the plaintiff's rights in relation to the property in controversy; that the action was commenced by the plaintiff as the agent and trustee of the defendants, and his denial "that there was no agreement between himself and Sadler that no judgment should be taken against Sadler, Torre, Barbieri or the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company," need occupy but little attention, as all the circumstances connected with the purchase and possession of the property, as well as the affidavits of Rives, Sadler and Torre, in support of the motion to dismiss, clearly show that plaintiff had agreed to and was holding the bill of sale of the property in trust for the defendants named, and for their use and benefit, and for the purpose of protecting their title to the property, and, as they supposed, to prevent Townshend from asserting any claim to the property, under an agreement entered into by Townshend on the one part, and Sadler, Torre and Barbieri on the second part, wherein they covenanted and agreed "that immediately upon the receipt by us of all moneys which we have agreed to pay said Eureka County Bank, and all money now due us from W. J. Townshend, together with all which we may hereafter have to pay out in order to conduct said stage line, and upon our being secured from loss by reason of our being sureties upon the mail contract bonds of said W. J. Townshend, we will transfer and set over unto said Townshend, or his order, all of said property connected with said lines which we may acquire in connection with the conduct of said lines, and which we may charge as having been necessarily purchased in the conducting of said lines and business. It is also understood and agreed that, in case we have to pay interest, and any money, to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, in order to carry on said stage lines, or to retain possession of the property hereinbefore mentioned as having been transferred to us, this agreement to reconvey shall become operative until such interest and payment to said Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company shall be repaid to us;" and, as was said in the case of Lord v. Veasie, supra, any judgment, entered under the above state of facts, would be a nullity; and a right of action must be complete before the suit is brought, and no subsequent occurrence of a material fact will avail the plaintiff in maintaining the suit. Moore v. Maple, 25 Ill. 343.

Therefore the assignment of the judgment by Haley to Ahern did not change the condition of things as to the fictitiousness of the action when commenced. There could be no rights, under such a judgment, to assign.

The plaintiff also objected to the reading of the affidavit of Rives, for the reason that the same was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and discloses information which was obtained when he was acting as attorney for the plaintiff, and discloses privileged communications between attorney and client, and that it attempts to prove facts contrary to the admitted allegations of the complaint. It did not disclose privileged communications. Some of the statements made by him were in the nature of communications received while acting as the agent and attorney for the defendants in the purchase of the property from the Eureka County Bank, Townshend, and the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, and conversations had by Haley and Sadler, in the presence and hearing of Rives; and such statements are not privileged, when the action is between the parties to the conversation. Michael v. Poll, 100 N. C. 178. Where an attorney was acting for both plaintiff and defendant in drawing a contract for them to sign, communications of the parties to such attorney are not confidential. Goodwin Gas-Stove & M. Co's App. 117 Pa. 514, 10 Cent. Rep. 761; Griffin v. Griffin, 125 Ill. 480; Hurlbut v. Hurlbut, 49 Hun, 189.

In the case of Bauer's Estate, 79 Cal. 304, the Supreme Court of California said: "When two persons address a lawyer as their common agent, their communications to the lawyer, as far as concerns strangers, will be privileged, but as to themselves they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, and either can compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations." The appellant claims that the court erred in granting said motion to dismiss, and in entering said judgment, for the reason that no jury was ever waived in this action. An answer to that objection is that a jury was not demanded, and by the silence of the plaintiff he waived his right thereto, if any he had.

In the case of Sheets v. Bray, 125 Ind. 33, the Supreme Court of Indiana said: "We have been unable to find any bill of exceptions in the record showing a request on the part of appellants for a jury trial, and a refusal and exception thereto, nor is any such bill referred to by counsel in their brief. In the absence of such request, the right to a trial by jury, if such right existed in this case, must be regarded as waived." Grant v. Hughes, 96 N. C. 177.

The objection of the plaintiff to G. W. Baker, as amicus curia, making the motion to dismiss the action, is without merit. In the earlier English cases we find that any stranger, as amicus curia, may move the court of matters apparent in the writ, and the court ex officio is bound to abate the writ, if it be vicious for false Latin or default of form, or that the one plea goes to the whole, and the court will discharge all others; or may move to quash an indictment apparently vicious, be the crime what it will; and a party was permitted to state in court that he was present at the making of the Statute and what was the intention of Parliament in enacting the law; and, if an action be abated, anyone may move to have the verdict set aside, even the defendant himself. 2 Vin. Abr. 175. If a judge be doubtful or mistaken in a matter of law, a stander-by may inform the court, as amicus curia. In some cases, a thing is to be made apparent by suggestion; on the roll, by motion; sometimes by pleadings; and sometimes as amicus curia. Taylor, Law Glossary, 43, and 29 Ind. supra. In the case of Ex parte Randolph, 2 Brock. 454, Mr. Nichols appeared as amicus curia at the request of the court, and argued the question therein pending. And in Ex parte Yeager, 11 Gratt. 656, where the petitioner had made application for a license to keep a public house, Fry, who was counsel in a similar action, was permitted to appear as amicus curia, and argue against granting the same. In the case of People v. Gibbs, 70 Mich. 426, Thompson asked permission of the court to assist in the prosecution of the case, he having theretofore had something to do with the prosecution, but his request was denied. Thompson then suggested to the court that the defendant be required to plead to the information. Counsel for the defendant objected to Thompson addressing the court, the objection was overruled, and the defendant required to plead. On appeal, the supreme court said: "The suggestion of Thompson was one which might very properly have been made, as amicus curia, by any member of the bar." The court may, and often does, of its own motion, ask of counsel information upon a point in doubt, or in relation to the merits of the case on trial. State v. McCullough, 20 Nev. 164.

It is not only the right, but the duty, of an attorney of the court, if he knows or has reason to believe that the time of the court is being taken up by the trial of a feigned issue, to so inform the judge thereof; and it is discretionary with the court to stay proceedings, make due inquiry, and, if the facts warrant the suggestion, then dismiss the case.

The judgment of the dismissal is affirmed.

Bigelow, J., dissenting:

In the verified complaint filed in this action, the plaintiff alleges that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of certain personal property of the value of $8,200, which the defendants have unlawfully taken from him, and converted to their own use. The defendants demurred; their demurrer was overruled; and, all but the bank failing to answer, their default was entered. Subsequently, upon their motion the default was set aside by the district court, but, upon appeal to this court, 20 Nev. 410, the order was reversed. Upon the return of the case to the district court, for further proceedings upon the default, on motion of the defendants' attorney, G. W. Baker, acting as amicus curia, the action was dismissed upon the ground that it was collusive and fictitious. It is agreed that the property originally belonged to the Utah, Nevada & California

Stage Company. One Townshend was in possession of it, under a contract of purchase, the company retaining title until it was paid for. The defendants were sureties upon a certain bond for Townshend, and he was also indebted to them. Becoming involved, he transferred the property to the Eureka Bank, to which he was also indebted. The defendants paid the bank the amount due it, and took possession of the property, under an agreement with Townshend that when they were indemnified upon the bond, and repaid the money advanced upon the property, and the amount then owing them, it was to revert to him. The defendants' evidence, upon the motion, tends further to prove that the stage company, demanding payment of the balance due it, was also paid by the defendants, but the legal title to the property was taken in the name of the plaintiff, under an agreement that he was to hold it in trust for them; that it was further agreed that the plaintiff should bring this action, obtain judgment against the defendants, and sell the property out in their interest. This, of course, vested the legal title in him, but as a trustee for the defendants, other than the Bank. On the other hand, the plaintiff denies this, and upon the hearing of the motion testified that he bought the property for his own purposes, paid for it with his notes, and that there was no agreement or understanding that he should hold it in trust or in any manner for the defendants. Under these circumstances, I shall not investigate the evidence, to determine whether the plaintiff's or the defendants' contention is the better supported by it. In my judgment, the principles asserted in Lord v. Yeasie, 49 U. S. 8 How. 251, 12 L. ed. 1067, and similar cases, concerning fictitious actions, have no application here. Taking the broadest and most charitable view of the defendants' case as presented upon the motion, it appeared that the plaintiff alleged by his verified complaint that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. The defendants admit that he holds the legal title, but claim that it is only in trust for them, and consequently he is not, as against them, entitled to its possession, nor to recover its value. The burden of showing this is, of course, upon them. This is the ordinary situation in a contested lawsuit: The plaintiff asserts a right, which the defendant denies. Under such circumstances, it has heretofore been supposed that the parties are entitled to a regular trial, either with or without a jury, as they may elect, to determine whether this right exists or not. This is perhaps the first time where, in advance of the trial, against the protests of one of the parties, the case has been taken up, the evidence heard, and the merits of the action decided upon a simple motion,—decided, too, against a plaintiff whose evidence made at least a prima facie case, such a case as would have prevented a nonsuit upon a trial. Unquestionably, before it could be determined that the action was collusive, it was necessary to decide the very point in dispute between the parties; that is, that the plaintiff was holding the title to the property in trust for the defendants. If he was not, if, as he alleged and testified, it was absolutely his, and they were wrongfully detaining it from him, then there was no collusion in commencing the action, nor in maintaining it. In determining this point against him, the court decided in the defendants' favor the only defense they could possibly have made, had they been allowed to answer. Usually, after a claim legal upon its face is sufficiently stated in a complaint, and the defendant has lost the right to make any defense, judgment goes against him as a matter of course. But here, after this right had been lost, the defendants were allowed, upon a mere motion, to make their whole defense, and in a much more expeditious manner than they could had they been permitted to answer. I say the defendants were allowed, because the proposition that Mr. Baker, who had been their attorney through all these years of litigation, made this motion, not in their interest, but as an amicus curia,—a friend of the court,—is too transparent for sober consideration.

2. If the transaction was just what the defendants claim it to have been, if the plaintiff took the title to the property in trust for the defendants, and commenced the action in their interest, it also appears clearly enough that this was done for the purpose of obtaining some unfair advantage of Townshend or his creditors. It is hard to determine just what their ideas were, probably owing to the fact that they themselves did not have a clear perception of them, but it is safe to say that men do not resort to such crooked methods for honest purposes. The bill of sale, vesting the legal title to the property in the plaintiff, was, in my judgment, under the circumstances, equivalent to the deed in Peterson v. Brown, 17 Nev. 175, and brings the case directly within the principles there laid down. In the attempt to overreach someone else, through the treachery of their confederate, they have been caught in their own trap, and neither law nor justice calls upon the courts to interfere in their behalf. Why this should be the rule has been so clearly and fully stated in the last-mentioned case that I refrain from saying more concerning it.

A fictitious case is one where, without there being any real litigation between the parties, a pretended case is presented, in which it is sought to obtain an authoritative decision of some point of law that will, as a precedent, determine the rights of others, who may have a real controversy with the parties to this collusive proceeding. This constitutes a fraud upon the third person, as well as the court, because it is highly probable that only one side will be properly presented or argued, and that consequently a biased decision will be rendered, that will affect their rights without their being heard. This is not that kind of a case. There is no question of law to be decided here, nor, whatever may have been the purpose in the beginning, will the result affect any third person. This is a case of attempted fraud, where the parties to the attempt, after going a certain length, and after, perhaps, reaping all the benefits they expected from their acts, have fallen out, the same as they did in Peterson v. Brown, and now the defendants are trying to relieve themselves from a position which they have voluntarily assumed, by showing that the bill of sale was not made, and the action based thereon was not brought, bona fide, but for the purpose of deceiving and overreaching others. To permit them to do this is to allow them to plead their own fraud in avoidance of the consequences of their acts. Of course, the plaintiff did not demand a jury trial upon the hearing of the motion. He would not have been entitled to it, if he had; for juries are not called to decide motions. Upon this point the error of the court consists in hearing and deciding, upon a mere motion, the entire merits of the action, without a trial of any kind, either with or without a jury. I think the judgment should be reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Albert LILIENTHAL et al.

v.

SUFFOLK BREWING CO.

(....Mass....)

1. An oral condition that an order shall "be no sale" if the market price is not as it is represented, is a condition subsequent and not precedent and cannot be proved to affect the terms of an unconditional written order.

2. False statements as to the market price of hops, made to the president of a brewing company to induce the purchase of a carload, do not justify its rescission where he said as to the statements first made that he did not believe them, and as to others that he had no means of information, and in addition made an oral condition on giving a written order for the hops that it should be no sale if the price was not as represented.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court, after directing a verdict in favor of plaintiffs of an action brought to recover damages because of defendant's refusal to comply with his alleged contract to accept and pay for certain hops. Judgment on the verdict.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Warren & Brandeis, for plaintiffs:

The evidence offered to prove the alleged condition was inadmissible.

It tended to show only, that the contract made contained a term not set out in the written memorandum, a condition subsequent, by which the defendant's obligation might be discharged, and not that, owing to a condition precedent, the defendant had never assumed any obligation.

Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198; Gordon v. Nieman, 118 N. Y. 152; Reynolds v. Robinson, 87 Hun, 561; Foley v. Cowgill, 5 Blackf. 18; Brewster v. Potruff, 55 Mich. 129; Daley v. W. W. Kimball Co. 67 Iowa, 183; Dulaney v. Burke (Idaho) March 5, 1890; Davis v. Randall, 115 Mass. 547; Fits v. Comey, 118 Mass. 100; Squires v. Amherst, 5 New Eng. Rep. 143, 145 Mass. 192; Chemical Electric Light & Power Co. v. Howard, 150 Mass. 495; Gried v. Lomas, 86 Ala. 183; Masonic Temple Assn. v. Channell, 48 Minn. 353; Nicholson v. Reeves, 94 N. C. 559; Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 323.

The elements necessary to establish the defense of false representations are a misrepresentation, by the party charged, of a material fact, not within the observation of the other party, the person making the representation either knowing it not to be true, or having no knowledge on the subject, and making it with utter disregard to its truth or falsity."

Cooper v. Lovering, 106 Mass. 77, 79.

The statements made in this case were not representations of facts, but expressions of opinion and judgment. Brown v. Castles, 11 Cush. 348; Hemmer v. Cooper, 8 Allen, 384; Manning v. Albee, 11 Allen, 520, 522; Richardson v. Noble, 77 Me. 390; Bourn v. Davis, 76 Me. 223; Foley v. Cowgill, 5 Blackf. 18; Oronk v. Cole, 10 Ind. 485; Grafenstein v. Epstein, 23 Kan. 448.

Such statements are mere instances of "dealer's talk" and unaccompanied, as they were in the case at bar, by the affirmation of any specific facts to induce belief, afford no ground,

NOTE.—Sales not affected by oral conditions subsequent.

The misrepresentation which will vitiate a contract of sale must relate to a material matter constituting an inducement to the contract, respecting which the complaining party had no means of knowledge, and upon which he relied, and by which he was actually misled to his injury. Slaughter v. Gerson, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 379, 20 L. ed. 637; Smith v. Richards, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 28, 10 L. ed. 48; Powell v. Adams, 96 Mo. 568.

An executed contract will not be rescinded in equity for representations which are mere expressions of opinion, or for errors as to facts, which did not change the conduct of the parties. Johanson v. Stephanson (U. S.) 23 L. ed. 1009.

If a purchaser does not avail himself of the means of knowledge within his reach, he will not be heard to say, in impeachment of the contract of sale, that he was deceived by the vendor's misrepresentations. Slaughter v. Gerson, supra.

Where there has been an innocent misrepresentation or misapprehension it does not authorize a rescission of the contract unless it is such as to show that there is a complete difference in substance between what was supposed to be and what was taken so as to constitute a failure of consideration. Kennedy v. Panama, N. Z. & A. R. Mail Co. L. R. 2 Q. B. 560.

even if willfully false, for avoiding a contract.

The facts were "within the observation" of the defendant.

Having had full means of informing himself, his reliance was not reasonably placed on the statements made, and even if those statements had been willfully false representations as to material facts, they would afford no defense.

Salem India Rubber Co. v. Adams, 28 Pick. 256, 265; Brown v. Leach, 107 Mass. 864, 868; Savage v. Stevens, 126 Mass. 207.

It is only when the knowledge is peculiarly in the possession of one party that his statement can be relied on by the other.

Noulan v. Cain, 8 Allen, 261; Burns v. Lane, 138 Mass. 350, 356.

The market value of a commodity has repeatedly been held not to be a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of one party, at least where the other has means of information.

Foley v. Cowgill, Orank v. Cole, Grafenstein v. Epstein and Poland v. Brownell, supra.

Messrs. Alfred Hemenway and H. F. Naphen, for defendant:

It is enough that the statement is untrue and relied upon. It is no defense that one had means of discovering the truth.

Hadley*, 3 Hurlst. & C. 227.

The market value of a staple like hops is a fact, not an opinion.

Whitney v. Thacher, 117 Mass. 523.

It is not needful that the defendant be fraudulently induced to forbear inquiry if he really relied on statement of plaintiffs' agent.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of contract for refusing to accept and pay for seventy bales of hops bought of the plaintiffs by the defendant. The defenses are that the defendant was induced to make the contract by the fraudulent representations of the plaintiff's agent, one Horst, as to the market price of hops, and that the agreement was made subject to a condition on the same matters, which was not satisfied. According to the testimony of Smith, the defendant's president, who made the bargain with Horst, Horst called on him several times trying to sell hops. On a Saturday, Horst said hops were worth twenty-five cents and Smith told him he didn't care, he didn't believe hops were worth twenty-five cents. On the next Monday, September 10, 1888, Horst called again and said that hops had advanced very much since last week, that they were now thirty cents a pound. Smith said he didn't care, he wasn't in want of hops. But being urged said, "If hops are going as you say very high, I will buy ten bales and run the risk, at thirty cents a pound." Horst refused and pulled out some telegrams, written in hieroglyphics, stating that hops before a week would be thirty-five cents. Smith told him he had no means of information; at all events he was not in the market for hops; but after a good deal of urging told him he would sign a memorandum for a carload of seventy bales on the condition that "when I return from Canada and find out that it was not the market price it will be no sale." At the same time Smith signed and delivered a memorandum for the defendant: "We have this day bought of Lillenthal Bros. seventy bales," etc., stating the terms of the bargain and mentioning no condition. On the 13th the plaintiffs wrote confirming the sale and thanking the defendant. Smith further testified that on his return from Canada on September 24 he found that the best hops in Boston were offered for twenty-five cents on September 10, and we will assume there was other evidence that that or about that was the market price. On September 25, Smith wrote the plaintiffs acknowledging their letters and saying nothing of the alleged condition, but complaining that "although of course I had no business to be ignorant of the state of the market," Horst had misrepresented it, and that unless there was some concession he should not accept the hops. Later the hops were refused.

So far as the alleged condition goes, it seems to us impossible to construe it as a condition precedent to the existence of the contract, as in Wilson v. Powers, 181 Mass. 539. The language testified to imports that a contract has been made or is about to be made, which is to be off in a certain event thereafter, not that the defendant will make a contract with the plaintiffs at some time in the future in case Smith finds Horst's statement to be true. The common sense of the thing and the correspondence of the parties, if consistent with the existence of any condition at all, leads to the same result. The plaintiffs assume in their letter that a sale has taken place. The defendant in his answer does the same thing. He says he gave Horst an order for seventy bales, and his suggestion that Horst misrepresented the market price as a ground for a concession is quite inconsistent with the notion that the moment only then had arrived for making a contract and that its existence depended on what he should then have discovered for himself touching the market price.

It is admitted that if the alleged condition was a condition subsequent the defendant was not entitled to prove or to rely upon it. There could be no argument that it was a subsequent modification of the written memorandum. It was strictly contemporaneous talk. Clark v. Houghton, 13 Gray, 38, 40, 41. This being so, of course the defendant could not modify by spoken words the effect of a writing signed by it, which purported to set forth all the terms of the bargain and to bind the defendant unconditionally to accept the hops. Davis v. Randall, 115 Mass. 547; Batchelder v. Queen Ins. Co. 185 Mass. 449; Gordon v. Nieman, 118 N. Y. 153; Daly v. W. W. Kimball Co. 67 Iowa, 182.

As the foregoing considerations justify the ruling of the court below that the alleged condition was no defense, we need go no further.

Next, as to fraud. Prima facie a statement to an experienced dealer in hops as to the market value of the article he is asked to buy is dealer's talk on a subject about which the seller has a right to assume that the buyer will make up his mind for himself, the means of information being equally open to both. Manning v. Albee, 11 Allen, 520, 523; Poland v. Brownell, 181 Mass. 188; Deming v. Darling, 148 Mass. 504, 2 L. R. A. 743; Foley v. Cowgill, 5 Blackf. 18; Cronk v. Cole, 10 Ind. 485; Graffenstein v. Epstein, 23 Kan. 443. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that a case might be supposed in which a jury would be warranted in finding from other facts beside the mere making of the representation that the buyer reasonably surrendered his judgment to the seller (Whiteside v. Brouley, 153 Mass. 183), this is not such a case. There were no such other facts. Moreover Smith's answer to Horst on Saturday was direct that he did not believe Horst's statement. So on Monday Smith's answer to Horst, that he had no means of information, imported in polite terms that he did not rely upon Horst, and if, as he says, Smith made a condition that if he found the price given was not the market price the sale was to be off, he told Horst in effect that he did not rely upon him but meant to find out for himself. The only fair inference from the evidence for the defendant is that its agent relied, not upon Horst's statements, but upon an oral condition, which fails for the reasons which we have given.

Judgment on the verdict.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

William PEABODY, Resp't.,

OREGON RAILWAY & NAVIGATION
CO., App't.

(Ort. Or.....)

*1. It is the duty of a passenger, if he has not the required ticket or token evi-

* Head notes by LORD, J.

NOTE.—Ejection of passenger for refusal to pay fare.

Many lines of strict analogy in a case recently decided by the New York Court of Appeals necessitate its production in this immediate connection. That case is authority for the proposition that a regulation of a railroad company requiring passengers either to present evidence to the conductor of a right to a seat, when reasonably required so to do, or to pay fare, is reasonable; and for noncompliance therewith a passenger may lawfully be put off the train. And the wrongful taking of the passenger's ticket by the conductor of a previous train, in which the former had performed part of his journey, does not exonerate him from compliance with this regulation. Townsend v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 56 N. Y. 286.

In Cheney v. Boston & M. R. Co. 11 Met. 121, the plaintiff purchased a ticket for a passage from Dunham to Boston. It was a rule of the defendant that a passenger should go through in the same train of cars. The plaintiff, after taking his seat, denying his right to travel on that train, to pay his fare or quietly leave the train when requested, and resort to his appropriate remedy for the damages he has sustained; and if he attempts to retain his seat without paying his fare, and is expelled by the conductor, using no more force than is necessary, he can recover no damages for the injury incurred by such expulsion.

2. When it is admitted that a railroad company is the owner of a railroad then being operated, a presumption arises that was so informed, and remonstrated. He stopped at an intermediate place, and went aboard of the next train and was required to pay fare again. The action was for money had and received and for breach of contract. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover. This case is, in principle, in point. See also Pierce, Am. Railway Law, 421.

A regulation made by a railroad corporation requiring passengers to exhibit their tickets whenever requested by the conductor, and directing the ejection from the cars of those who should refuse to do so, is a reasonable and proper one. The passenger is bound to conform to such regulation, and forfeits his right to be carried further by his refusal to comply with it. Hibbard v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 455.

If the plaintiff had forfeited his right to be carried as a passenger by refusing to show his ticket when requested to do by the conductor, and if the right was not restored by subsequently complying, then his expulsion was lawful and he has nothing to complain of, unless greater force and violence the same is operated by the company owning it, and the burden of proof is upon such company to show to the satisfaction of the jury that such is not the fact.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wasco County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for plaintiff's alleged wrongful expulsion from defendant's train. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The right of a passenger by virtue of his payment of fare is a right to a continuous ride, though the railway company, through its authorized agents, may by express agreement provide otherwise.

The Wisconsin Court of Appeals, in a unanimous opinion delivered by Chief Justice Cole, referring to the case of Townsend v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., supra, says: "The court held that he was lawfully put off the train, notwithstanding the wrongful act of the previous conductor in taking his ticket. The case is well considered, and the opinion by Judge Grover is very instructive. Substantially the same doctrine as to the rights and duties of passengers is laid down in Shelton v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 29 Ohio St. 214; Downs v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 38 Conn. 287; and McClure v. Philadelphia & W. B. R. Co. 34 Md. 532." See Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 54 Wis. 239, 6 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 322.

In the case last above cited it was held: A regulation by a railway company by which one who has paid his fare between two points on the road, who desires to stop over at an intermediate point, is required to procure a stop-over ticket from the conductor and present it to the conductor of the train on which he seeks to complete his journey, as evidence of his right to do so without further payment, is a reasonable regulation.

A passenger holding a ticket, the limitation of which has expired, cannot insist that the conductor shall take it in violation of a regulation of the company requiring the conductor to demand train fare of persons without tickets, although he may have an understanding or contract with the station agent of whom the ticket was purchased that it would be received after the time limited on the face of it; and on the refusal to pay the fare, ejection from the train would not be wrongful. The measure of damages in a suit for a breach of the alleged contract is, in the absence of proof of any special

The action in this case was grounded upon a supposed lawfulness on the train, arising from what plaintiff contended was a right, growing out of mere contract, and without any evidence of his right to exhibit to the officers in charge of the train. For the damage recovered in this action, this character of action was improperly brought.

Where a party has no evidence of his right to ride, but has in fact some contract which might give him a right if specifically enforced, he cannot undertake its specific performance, invite force for his expulsion, and then, having damage by delay, only the price of the extra fare demanded and paid for transportation to the place of destination. Hall v. Memphis & C. B. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 57, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 348.

In another case the conductor, when the ticket was presented, saw no stamp upon it. The plaintiff had not been identified, and the rules of the company, binding upon him as a conductor, required him to remove the party unless he paid his fare. Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 326.

A rule directing conductors to remove from the cars those who refuse to comply with the requirement is reasonable. The fact that a ticket has been purchased by a passenger, which was afterwards wrongfully taken up by a conductor of one of the defendant's trains, will not relieve the passenger from the duty of providing himself with a ticket or paying fare on another train of the defendant in which he may be a passenger. In such case, the right of action of the passenger would be for the wrongful taking up of the ticket, and not for having been removed from a train by another conductor for refusing to pay fare. Shelton v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 29 Ohio St. 214.

A passenger who is without a ticket and declines to pay full fare may ordinarily be ejected from a train at a station, as one may who absolute refuses to pay his fare. *State v. Lord, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in tort to recover damages for the wrongful acts of the defendant's agents or servants in ejecting the plaintiff from one of its cars. There are mainly two questions presented by this record, but the controlling one arose substantially out of this state of facts: The plaintiff, who is a stockdealer, had shipped stock from Grant's Station to Portland, and had received from the Railroad Company a shipping contract which entitled him, upon the performance of certain conditions, to a passage from Grant's to Portland and return. Going to the office of the Company earlier than its business hours, he was unable to get the ticket stamped, and otherwise perform its conditions so as to ride upon it, without taking a later train, so he went on the train then ready, and seated himself in the car. When the conductor came around for tickets, he presented to him his shipping contract, but it not being stamped, etc., as required, the conductor refused to receive it, and informed him that he must pay his fare, which the plaintiff did, giving the conductor a $20 gold piece, from which the amount of his fare from Portland to Grant's was to be taken. At this time, according to his testimony, he asked the conductor if he would be allowed to stop over at The Dalles, and go to Grant's on the next train, to which the conductor replied that he could do so, and that it would be all right.

The conductor, not being able to make the necessary change for the fare, after an absence of about twenty minutes, during which time he was engaged in taking up tickets, etc., returned with the change and a drawback check, which he delivered to the plaintiff. Upon the back of the drawback check was a receipt for the fare, but the check itself had printed upon it in large and legible words, "Good for this day and train only." The plaintiff does not seem to have given any attention to the check, or what was written or printed upon it, but, acting upon the assurance of the conductor that he would be permitted to stop over at The Dalles, he did so, and, after remaining some hours, he took another train for the completion of his journey to Grant's. A short time after he entered upon this train, the conductor called upon him for his ticket, and he presented the drawback check and the receipt, which the conductor refused to accept, stating that it did not entitle him to ride upon that train, when he then explained to him the circumstances under which it was delivered to him by the other conductor, and claimed the right to continue his ride to Grant's Station. The conductor told him that he was required by the rules and regulations of the Company to collect fare, or a ticket entitling the passenger to ride, and that none of the papers which he had presented entitled him to ride on that train, and that, unless he paid his fare, his duty would require him to expel him from the cars. After waiting until the train had proceeded several miles and arrived at a station, the conductor informed him that, unless he paid his fare, he would be under the necessity of requiring him to leave the train. The plaintiff pointedly refused to leave or to pay his fare, when the conductor finding he would do neither one nor the other, with the aid of the brakeman undertook to expel him from the car, which the plaintiff resisted with all his force, and manifested a disposition to fight, but when finally expelled from the train he tendered his fare, was received again on the train, and carried to his destination. His own evidence concedes that the duty of expelling was an unpleasant task to the conductor, and performed under the circumstances indicated. From this statement of the facts it is apparent that the plaintiff was without any proper evidence or token of his right to transportation on that train, other than his statements to the second conductor of the oral representations of the other conductor of such permission. Although a disputed fact at the trial, the conductor denying he ever made such representations or gave such permission, we shall assume its verity after verdict. Under such circumstances, was it the duty of the plaintiff, when notified by the conductor that he could not receive the drawback check, to pay his fare under protest, or leave the train without rendering it necessary for the conductor to resort to force to secure his removal. The drift of the defendant's contention is that it is a recognized right of every railroad company to make such reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its business as may be necessary, and that it is a reasonable exercise of this right to require that every passenger shall, when called upon by the conductor, present a ticket conforming to its reasonable rules and regulations, or, if he is unable so to do, that he shall pay his fare, but if he cannot produce the required ticket, and refuses to pay his fare, that he may be lawfully ejected from the train. In this view, as between the plaintiff and the conductor of the train from which he was expelled, unless he could produce the required ticket as evidence of his right to ride on that train, or in default thereof to pay his fare, the conductor would not be authorized to allow him to proceed to his destination on such train on his statement of the oral representations of the other conductor, inconsistent with the face of his ticket, and contrary to the rules and regulations of the Company. To that conductor the ticket which the plaintiff produced was to be taken as conclusive evidence of his right to travel on that train, and, it failing, the conductor could not receive the statements of the plaintiff contradicting its plain terms, and allow him to retain his seat. Upon this assumption, when the plaintiff was unable to produce the required ticket evidencing his right to travel on that train, and refused to pay his fare or to leave the train when requested, stopped at a proper place, the conductor was authorized lawfully to expel him from the train, and the defendant is not responsible in damages for injuries incurred in resistance to such expulsion. Summed up, then, the considerations in support of the principle invoked are: That as between the conductor and passenger, the right of the latter to ride must be evidenced by some proper token or ticket; that neither the time nor the occasion is suitable for an investigation, whether of explanation, or representations of another conductor in conflict with the terms of the ticket, and contrary to the rules of the Company; that it is better, under such circumstances, that the passenger comply if he is unable to produce the required ticket, and pay his fare, or leave the train quietly, and suffer the temporary inconvenience which results, than that the business of the road be interrupted to the annoyance of the traveling public; that such a course would avoid all liability to unseemly struggles, often occurring in the presence of women and children, and prevent breaches of the peace, and at the same time secure the passenger ample redress in the remedies which the law provides. The application of this principle includes a variety of cases, as where the passenger is unable to produce any token or ticket as evidence of his right to ride, or the ticket which he does produce is irregular or defective, due to the fault or negligence of the agents of the company.

In Frederick v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co., 37 Mich. 342, the plaintiff held an insufficient ticket, caused by the fault of the company's agent in delivering to him a ticket to the wrong station. He asked and paid for a ticket to a given station, and received what he supposed was such ticket, but which on its face was only good to a point short of his destination. In passing upon this question the court observed: "How, then, is the conductor to ascertain the contract entered into between the passenger and the railroad company, where a ticket is purchased and presented to him? Practically there are but two ways,—one, the evidence offered him by the ticket; the other, the statements of the passenger contradicted by his ticket. Which should govern? In judicial investigations we appreciate the necessity of an obligation of some kind, and the benefit of a cross-examination. At common law, parties interested were not competent witnesses, and even under our Statutes the witness is not permitted, in certain cases, to testify as to facts which, if true, were equally within the knowledge of the opposite party, and cannot be procured. Yet here would be an investigation as to the terms of the contract where no such safeguards could be thrown around it, and where the conductor, at his peril, would have to accept of the statement of the interested party. I doubt the practical workings of such a method, except for the purpose of encouraging and developing fraud and falsehood, and I doubt if any system could be devised that would so much tend to the disturbance and annoyance of the traveling public generally. As between conductor and passenger, and the right of the latter to travel, the ticket produced must be conclusive evidence, and he must produce it when called upon, as evidence of his right to the seat he claims. Where a passenger has purchased a ticket, and the conductor does not carry him according to its terms, or if the company, through the mistake of its agent, has given him a wrong ticket, so that he has been compelled to relinquish his seat, or pay his fare a second time in order to retain it, he would have a remedy against the company for a breach of the contract, but he would have to adopt a declaration differing essentially from the one resorted to in this case."

In Townsend v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 295, the court says: "The question in this case is whether a wrongful taking of a ticket of a passenger by the conductor of one train exonerates him from compliance with the regulations on another on which he wishes to proceed upon his journey. I am unable to see how the wrongful act of the previous conductor can at all justify the passenger in violating the lawful regulations upon another train. . . . The conductor of the train upon which he was not bound to take his word that he had had a ticket showing his right to a passage to Rhinebeck, which had been taken up by the conductor on the other train. His statement to that effect was wholly immaterial, and it was the duty of the conductor to the company to enforce the regulation, as was repeatedly held by the trial judge, by putting the plaintiff off in case he persistently refused to pay fare. The question is whether, under the facts found by the jury, his resistance in the performance of this duty was lawful on the part of the plaintiff. If so, the singular case is presented where the regulation of the company was lawful, where the conductor owed a duty to the company to execute it, and at the same time the plaintiff had a right to repel force by force, and to use all that was necessary to retain his seat in the car. Thus a desperate struggle might ensue, attended by very serious consequences, when both sides were entirely in the right, so far as either could ascertain. All this is claimed to result from the wrongful act of the conductor of another train in taking a ticket from the plaintiff, for which wrong the 12 L. R. A.

plaintiff had a perfect remedy without inviting the commission of an assault and battery by persisting in retaining a seat upon another train, in violation of the lawful regulations by which those in charge were bound to govern themselves.

In Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. R. Co., 54 Wis. 284, the plaintiff had purchased a ticket to the place of his destination, and asked the conductor for a stop-over ticket, and, through the fault or mistake of the conductor, he received a trip or train check instead of a stop-over ticket for which he asked, and which the conductor undertook to give him. The conductor of the second train refused to recognize it for fare, and demanded passage money or a ticket, which being refused, the plaintiff was ejected from the train. The court says: "Then the question arises, Was the plaintiff entitled to ride on a subsequent train, not having the proper stop-over check, or was the second conductor justified, under the circumstances, in putting him off the train when he refused to pay his fare? . . . He was perfectly justified in ejecting plaintiff from his train when plaintiff had no proper voucher, produced no sufficient evidence of his right to ride thereon, and refused to pay fare, and he himself was ignorant of the transaction between plaintiff and Conductor Sherman [the first conductor]. It seems to us there was no other course for him to pursue under the rules of the company, for he was certainly not bound to take the plaintiff's word that he had paid his fare, and that Sherman had made a mistake in not giving him a stop-over check. It is apparent that the right of plaintiff to ride on the train without a proper voucher, and the right of the second conductor to eject him for want of said voucher, were inconsistent rights. Each could not co-exist at the same time. Mistake or fault of the conductor in not giving him, on request, such a check, would not give him a lawful right to ride on the second train, though he might require damages against the company for the wrongful act of the first conductor."

In Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co., 185 Mass. 407, the court says: "It is no hardship upon the passenger to put upon him the duty of seeing to it in the first instance that he receives and presents to the conductor a proper ticket or check, or, if he fails to do this, to leave him to his remedy against the company for a breach of its contract. Otherwise the conductor must investigate and determine the question as best he can while the car is on its passage. The circumstances would not be favorable for a correct decision in a doubtful case." See also Mosher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 326; Hall v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 15 Fed. On the other hand, the contention for the plaintiff is that when he paid his fare from Portland to Grant's, upon the representation and promise of the conductor that he could stop over at The Dalles and ride upon the next train, and the conductor delivered to him a drawback check with a receipt for the money indorsed on the back thereof, and that, in pursuance of such agreement and promise, he, having stopped over, and then gone upon the second train without notice of any contrary regulation until after he commenced his journey, was not compelled to pay fare or leave the train, but that he was lawfully there, and might stand upon his rights, and, if wrongfully ejected by the conductor, he could recover damages for any injuries which he suffered in consequence of such ejection. Upon the facts there is no doubt but that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the rules or regulations of the Company, and, as the agreement for a ticket with the right to stop over was made before the ticket was delivered, the plaintiff cannot be deemed to have assented to any part of the contract expressed by the ticket different from that made with the conductor. As he wished to make his journey over the road on different trains to accommodate his business engagements, the conductor must be supposed to have known what the rules and regulations required in respect to the matter upon which he desired information. He was the person appointed by the Company to impart the information asked, and to sell and deliver to him a ticket as evidence of his right to ride. This agent assures him that he can pay his fare to Grant's Station, and that he can stop over at the place designated, and the plaintiff, relying upon his representations, pays his fare. His ticket is not delivered to him immediately for want of change, and not until some twenty minutes after his contract or understanding of permission to stop over was made, showing that he parted with his money in reliance upon the contract made or permission given, and not upon a ticket which he had not seen, expressing different terms, or terms inconsistent with his right to pursue his journey upon the next train. When the ticket was delivered to him, supposing that it is sufficient, or that the conductor whose duty it was to furnish it would deliver one conforming to their engagement, and relying upon his contract as made, he puts the ticket into his pocket without observing its terms, or that it expressly limits his right to ride on that day and train only, and stops over at The Dalles; and when he commences his journey on the next train, and his ticket is demanded of him, he is informed by the conductor that it is insufficient, when he explains to him the contract he made with the other conductor, and that he is on that train in pursuance of his assurances and contract, but the second conductor refuses to receive his explanations, and demands of him the payment of his fare, or the alternative of leaving the train, both of which he refuses to do, claiming that he is lawfully upon the train, and resisting with force his expulsion from it. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff contends that the contract established the relation of passenger and carrier, and, if the ticket furnished by its agent was insufficient to notify the second conductor of his right to travel on that train, that it was the negligence of the other conductor, and that he, being without fault, had a lawful right to travel on that train, and might resist his ejection, and, if ejected, he could recover damages for any injury which he suffered by reason of such ejection.

In support of this contention numerous authorities are cited, to which it is not possible to make full reference. Perhaps as strong a case as any is Head v. Georgia Pac. R. Co., 79 Ga. 338, which, like the case at bar, was an action in tort for the expulsion of the plaintiff from the cars of the defendant. By some negligence of the company's agent the plaintiff's ticket was not stamped or signed as required by the conditions of the ticket and the regulations of the company. He presented the ticket for his fare, but it was refused by the conductor, and for his expulsion the court held that he could recover "his proper damages of all sort," and among other things saying: "The company could no more be heard to say that an error was committed by its agent, resulting in a breach of duty on its part to the plaintiff, than it can be heard to say that an error was committed by its own action. . . . He [the plaintiff] had a right to assume that all these agents understood their duties and would perform them; and, if he performed his, he could stand upon his contract, and upon his relation as a passenger which the contract generated."

In Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Rice, 64 Md. 68, the plaintiff had gone upon one of the trains of the company with a proper ticket, and the conductor canceled it by mistake, but afterwards attempted to correct it, and assured the plaintiff that it would be all right, and that he could ride upon it on the next train in that condition. It was not properly corrected, and when the plaintiff went upon the returning train and presented the ticket the conductor refused to take it, and the plaintiff, refusing to pay his fare or leave the train, was expelled therefrom. The court says: "The return coupon was canceled through the mistake of the conductor. This error he attempted to correct, and informed plaintiff that it was all right. The latter had a right to rely on this assurance, and that the ticket for which he had paid his money entitled him to return to Wilmington. If the servants of the appellant, under such circumstances, laid their hands forcibly upon the plaintiff, and compelled him to leave the car, there was not merely a breach of contract on the part of the company, but an unlawful interference with the person of the plaintiff and an indignity to his feelings for which an action will lie, and for which he is entitled to be compensated in damages. Such is the well-settled law of this State and of this country. The mistake by which plaintiff's ticket was canceled was the mistake of the appellant's servants, and it must abide the consequences."

In Hufford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 64 Mich. 681, the plaintiff purchased in good faith of the ticket agent a genuine ticket, issued by the company, which the agent had a right to sell, covering the distance between two stations, and was informed by the agent that it "was good, and entitled him to ride between said stations." The court says: "When the plaintiff told the conductor on the train that he had paid his fare, and stated the amount he paid to the agent who gave him the ticket he presented, and told him it was good, it was the duty of the conductor to accept the statement of the plaintiff until he found out that it was not true, no matter what the ticket contained in words, figures or other marks." See also Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. McDonough, 58 Ind. 289; Burnham v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 23 Me. 298; Hamilton v. Third Ave. R. Co. 53 N. Y. 25; Palmer v. Charlotte, O. & A. R. Co. 3 S. C. 580; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Fia, 88 Ind. 381; English v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 66 N. Y. 454; Tarbell v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 24 Hun, 53.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff never had any valid ticket or evidence of his right to ride or travel on the train from which he was expelled. His ticket was not even apparently valid on its face when offered, and is not within the principle or reason of some of the cases cited in support of his contention. That he had paid his fare to his destination, and that the conductor represented that he might stop over at The Dalles, may be admitted, but the ticket he received furnished no evidence of that permission, was inconsistent with it, and when offered it was after the right, according to its terms, had expired to travel upon it. It is not the case of a passenger with a valid ticket entitling him to a ride on the train from which he was ejected, or with such a ticket as he was required to have, and by some mistake or fault of the conductor wrongly canceled, as in Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Rice, 64 Md. 68; or surrendered to the proper agent of the Company on demand, and receiving back what the agent believed to be the proper evidence of a right to ride on it, and when presented to the other conductor refused, despite the explanations offered, as in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Fia, 88 Ind. 384; or as in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. McDonough, 58 Ind. 288; or where the ticket appears upon its face to be good, although not a regular ticket, but which the ticket agent assures the passenger is sufficient, after his attention has been recalled to it, and is afterwards refused by the conductor on the train, as in Huford v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 53 Mich. 118, 64 Mich. 631, or where the plaintiff has paid his fare, and the same conductor to whom he paid it asks for it again, and insists, unless it is paid, that he would put the plaintiff off, and the latter, refusing to pay, is forcibly ejected from the train, as in English v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 66 N. Y. 454; or where the plaintiff was not guilty of any negligence in accepting his ticket, but carefully examined it, saw everything there was on it, and received explanation of the meaning of the punched holes, and assurances that the ticket in the condition in which it was would be good for the trip, and the conductor refused to receive it, as in Murdock v. Boston & A. R. Co., 137 Mass. 298, and in some other cases cited which might be distinguished. It is true that the principle announced in some of the authorities cited is in conflict with the contention for the defendant, and, while I own some reluctance, it seems to me that the weight of authority and reason, as applicable to the facts as disclosed by this record, is that it is the duty of the passenger to pay his fare or quietly to leave the train when requested, if he has not the proper ticket, and resort to his appropriate remedy for the damages he has sustained; but that if he attempts to retain his seat without paying his fare, and is expelled by the conductor, he can recover no damages for the injuries incurred by the expulsion. This result will tend to avoid unseemly struggles occurring on railroad trains, usually filled with passengers, including women and children, and thereby prevent breaches of the peace, and at the same time will fully protect the passenger by making the Company responsible for all damages resulting from any breach of its contract. It is not disputed that the business of ejecting the plaintiff was extremely disagreeable to the conductor, and that he made considerable effort to induce the plaintiff to pay his fare or peaceably to leave the train, but that the plaintiff not only insisted on being put off by force, but resisted with all the force he could command. It is hardly necessary to say that no reference is intended to apply to agents of the company who act wantonly or willfully or maliciously, or that a trespasser upon a train can be treated in a willful, wanton or malicious manner.

2. The motion for nonsuit was based principally upon the idea that the evidence for the defendant was the only evidence in the case, and that this so conclusively showed that the defendant had leased its road and ceased to operate it at the time of the injury that the court erred in submitting the case to the jury. The stipulation and pleadings admit that the defendant was the owner of the road. When it is admitted that a railroad company is the owner of a railroad then being operated, a presumption arises that the same is operated by the company owning it, and the burden of proof is upon such company to show to the satisfaction of the jury that such is not the fact. Thus in Ferguson v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co., 63 Wis. 145, the court says: "When a railroad company owns a railroad in operation, bearing the name of the company, the presumption is that such company operates it, and in order to relieve itself from liabilities for injuries to persons upon such road, caused by the negligence of the employes operating the same, the burden of proof is upon it to show that it does not operate the same." Nor, is it disputed but that at common law the general rule was, where unimpeached witnesses testify distinctly and positively to a fact and are uncontradicted their testimony was to be credited, and to have the effect of overcoming a mere presumption. "But this rule," as Rapallo, J., observed, "is subject to many qualifications." Elwood v. Western U. Telog. Co. 45 N. Y. 558. Our Code provides that the jury "are not bound to find in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number, or against a presumption, or other evidence satisfying their minds." Hill's Code, § 845, subd. 2. This seems to indicate, as was contended, that where a presumption arises in any case the jury are not bound to believe the declarations of a witness, or a number of them, contradicting the presumption, but that the credibility of such witness or witnesses then becomes a question for them, and, if they are not satisfied of the truthfulness of the evidence of such witnesses, they are not bound to believe it, but may find in accordance with the presumption. The execution of the lease is admitted, but the transfer and possession under it are disputed, and the establishment of that fact is dependent upon the testimony of Mr. Cookingham, and certain telegrams and circulars offered through him for that purpose. The lease itself purports to have been executed in April, 1887, and before the statute for its authorization had gone into effect; but, waiving this, the truth of the transfer and possession, which ought to have been clear and decisive, was vague and unsatisfactory. From the nature of the circumstances, and as Mr. Cookingham stood related to them, it was not possible for him to testify positively or distinctly as to this transaction. Nor do the telegram and circular relied upon to establish the transfer and possession, aided by the testimony of Mr. Cookingham, render the proof in that regard much more definite and satisfactory. Owing to their vagueness as applied to the subject matter in dispute, without his testimony they are of little value as evidence. Much that he testifies to is but hearsay, much mere conclusions, and as to what may be regarded as relevant, it was for the jury to pass upon the weight to be given to his statements in respect thereto, and his credibility. Taking, then, into consideration the presumption of operation of the road from its ownership, and in addition thereto that the stock contract upon which plaintiff shipped his cattle and rode to Portland was drawn in the name of the defendant Company, and signed by the agent, as the agent of the defendant, for that Company; that the lettering upon its cars and tickets, drawback checks, and other writings, etc., were likewise in the name of the defendant Company; together with the testimony of the plaintiff, keeping in mind that the jury are the judges of the credibility of the witnesses,—it would be difficult on this record to assign any just or legal reason to withdraw the case from the jury. Leaving out of view the question of credibility, before a withdrawal of a case from a jury can be justified, the facts of the case should not only be undisputed, but the conclusion to be drawn from them indisputable. But, whether the facts be disputed or undisputed, if different minds may honestly draw different conclusions from them the case should be properly left to the jury. Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745.

Upon this point we think there was no error in refusing the motion for nonsuit. But in view of the considerations already expressed the judgment is reversed, and the plaintiff remitted to his remedy in accordance therewith.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

BIRMINGHAM MINERAL R. CO., Appt.,

v.
Hannah JACOBS, Admx., etc., of Peter Jacobs, Deceased.

(....Ala.....)

1. A dummy railroad operated by steam and running beyond the lines of a municipality, organized under Acts Feb. 26, 1887, which authorize corporations to construct such roads in a city or town and also "upon any of the public roads of any county," upon such terms and in such manner as may be authorized by the city and county authorities respectively, is a "railroad" within the meaning of Code, § 1146, requiring trains to be stopped within 100 feet of a place where it crosses the track of another railroad.
2. It is no excuse for failure to stop a railroad train within 100 feet of a place where the track crosses another railroad, as required by statute, that the rear of the train would thus be left standing across another track.
3. Proof that an act was negligently done will not sustain a charge that it was fully done.

NOTE.—Railroads, crossing lines; regulations by statutes.

Statutes in relation to penalties for failure of a railroad company to stop its trains before crossing another railroad, are constitutional. Mix v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 8 West. Rep. 493, 116 Ill. 502.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's wrong-doing. Reversed.

The deceased was an engineer of the Ensley Railway Company. His death was caused by a collision between defendant's train and the engine upon which deceased was at work, at a point where the tracks of the two companies crossed each other.

The other facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question involved in this case is whether the Ensley Railway Company is a railroad within the meaning of section 1145 of the Code of 1896, which reads as follows: "When the tracks of two railroads cross each other, engineers and conductors must cause the trains of which they are in charge to come to a full stop within 100 feet of such crossing, and not proceed until they know the way to be clear." It is contended that this law does not apply to the Ensley Railway Company. The purpose of the Statute was to guard against collisions at these crossings. Prior to the adoption of the Code of 1886, the distance within which trains were required to stop was 50 feet, and the distance was extended to 100 feet on account of the difficulty of controlling the large engines and heavily loaded trains. The purpose of the Statute, as we have said, is to prevent collision, and the fact that some engines and trains, by reason of their structure and appliances are more easily managed than others, and may be stopped within a distance of 20, 30 or 50 feet, is no reason why the law should not apply to them. It may be conceded in argument that there are many sections in the Code applicable to railroads which do not and were not intended to apply to street railways. We hold that the Ensley Railway Company is not a street railway, within the meaning of the Constitution and the statutes which provide for the incorporation, organization and government of street railways, but that it is a "railroad company," within the meaning of section 1178 of the Code of 1886. The constitutional provision is as follows: "No street passenger railway shall be constructed within the limits of any city or town without the consent of its civil authorities." Code, p. 49, § 24.

The statute laws pertaining to street railways are found in chapter 7, title 1, of the Code of 1886, beginning with section 1608 and ending with section 1612, and, so far as respects the question under consideration, are substantially the same as section 1917 to 1929, inclusive, of the Code of 1876. Section 1608 of the Code of 1886 reads as follows: "Corporations for constructing, maintaining and operating street railways in a town or city may be formed in the mode prescribed, and have the capacity and powers in this chapter expressed." It is evident from the Constitution, and from this section and those which follow, that street railways here intended are only those to be formed, maintained, and operated in a town or city. The phraseology of the law, the location, uses and purposes contemplated of street railways, and their subjection to municipal ordinance lead to this conclusion.

The Ensley Railway Company is not included within this class of corporations, or within the meaning of "street railways," as defined by Elliott, in his excellent work on Roads and Streets. See pages 557-560. Its lines extend beyond municipal corporation control, and its corporate existence, authority and powers are not derived from or subject to municipal regulations. It was incorporated and organized by virtue of an Act of the Legislature adopted February 25, 1887, page 144.* Until the adoption of this Act, there was no law which authorized the formation of a corporation like that of the Ensley Railway Company. The second section of the Act reads as follows: "Sec. 2. Be it further enacted that section 1921 of the Code of Alabama be amended so as to read as follows, namely: 'Sec. 1921. Road located by authorities of cities or towns and counties; power to make and alter contracts: Such corporation shall have power to construct, maintain and use a street railroad upon the streets and upon the lines and between the termini named in the certificate in any city or town, upon such terms and in such manner as may be authorized by the ordinance or other lawful act of the proper authorities of such city or town, and upon any of the public roads of any county, upon such terms and in such manner as may be so authorized by the proper authorities of such county; and such railroad company may contract with such counties, cities, or towns therefor, and the contract may be altered when both parties agree to the change.'" Before the adoption of this Act, it must be admitted there were no street railways in the State outside of the corporate limits of a city or town, and none were contemplated by the then existing laws.

A railroad organized under this Act of the Legislature, running beyond the corporate limits of any city or town and through counties, is not, and necessarily cannot be, a street railway, within the meaning of the Constitution and the provisions of the Code in regard to street railways. Except as to its termini, it is entirely independent of municipal control. It derives its corporate powers and existence under the Act of the Legislature, after leaving the city boundaries, by contract with the counties through which it runs. There is no limitation to the extent of such a road. Under its provisions a road could be constructed from Huntsville to Mobile, traversing the entire length of the State. There is no limitation upon the power and character of the propelling force or the business to be conducted. It is common knowledge that railroads incorporated under this Act, having in use heavy dummy engines, run from Birmingham to Bessemer City, and to other parts of the State, traversing wide scopes of country with regular stations, soliciting patronage, and competing with other railroads in carrying both freight and passengers. The very Act itself, in the second section, no longer designates railroads organized under its provisions, after they leave the corporate limits, as street railways, but as "railroad companies." They are engaged in the same business as other roads, and propelled by the same dangerous power of steam, and attended with the dangers incident to the operation of other railroads. Is there any reason why such roads should not provide comfortable depots for passengers, in the country, and have their freight rates regulated, where they carry freight, and be taxed as other railroads engaged in like business? Is there any reason why they should not be required to put up signboards, and ring signal bells, and stop their trains at public road crossings and at railroad crossings, and observe all the safeguards required of other railroads to prevent collisions and for the protection of human life? Is it reasonable to hold that, because of the structure of dummy engines, many of these regulations can be observed and complied with by those in control of them, more easily than by other engines, therefore they shall not obey them at all? After leaving the city limits, as we have shown, they are no longer street railways, subject to municipal regulations; and if not railroads, within the meaning of the general law, we may well inquire, What kind of railroads are they and by what laws are they governed? Can it be presumed that the Legislature intended to provide for the incorporation of a species of railroad companies "sui generis" not subject to any law except the common law for common carriers, while the duties and liabilities of all other railroad companies are regulated and controlled by statutory enactment? We are of the opinion that the Ensley Railway comes directly within "railroad companies" as defined by section 1178 of the Code of 1886, and which is as follows: "Sec. 1178. Meaning of 'railroad company.' Unless clearly otherwise apparent from the context, the term 'railroad company,' as used in this chapter includes any person or corporation owning or operating a railroad." This Statute is broad and comprehensive. There is nothing in this section to indicate that the number of incorporators, or the manner of the organization, enters into the definition. The only exception is, where it is "clearly otherwise apparent from the context." We should say a horse-car is not expected to carry a steam-whistle, and for obvious reasons would be clearly excepted. Section 1145, which requires engineers and conductors to stop their trains where two railroads cross each other is included in the chapter referred to in section 1178.

*This Act provides the manner in which "any number of natural persons, associating to form a corporation for the purpose of constructing and using a street railroad in, or in and near, or between, any of the cities or towns of this State" may be incorporated. [Rep.]

The Act of February 28, 1889, 1020, enlarging the charter, and conferring additional powers on the Ensley Railway Company, strengthens our position. That Act declares, among other things: "The Ensley Railway Company shall have and possess all rights, powers and privileges and immunities of the general laws of this State conferred on railroad companies." It must be admitted that this Act in no way changes the character of the engines used, the business of the company, or creates a necessity for having depots, or the ringing of bells, blowing of whistles, or stopping at public road crossings or railroad crossings, which did not exist before its passage. It cannot be contended that the effect of this Act was to change the relation of the road to the cities or towns in which are located its termini, or its relation to the country through which it passes, and the contract with the cities and county under which it was incorporated and organized. The number of incorporators and the mode of organization remain the same. The Act may have been passed out of abundant caution, or for some purpose not developed on this trial, but we can see no reason why the Act of the Legislature should bring the Ensley Railway within the definitions of "railroad companies," as given in section 1178 of Code 1886, supra, which did not exist prior to its passage. There was nothing in its incorporation, its motive power, its business and location, to exclude it from this section. Whether the Act of February 25, 1887, is obnoxious to the constitutional provision of article 4, § 2, which declares that "each law shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title," is not determined, because it is not deemed necessary to a decision of the question before us. See Ex parte Reynolds, 87 Ala. 188; Ex parte Covert (Ala.) 9 South. Rep. 225.

After a careful consideration of the question, the majority of the court is of the opinion that the trial court did not err in holding that section 1145 of the Code applied to the Ensley Railway Company. The court is unanimous in all other respects.

Since writing the foregoing opinion we have been furnished with a certified copy of an opinion recently delivered by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in the case of Katsenburger v. Lano, 16 S. W. Rep. 611, by Lurton, J. In that case the court holds that dummy engines, whether operated within or beyond the municipal limits, are subject to the general statutes regulating and prescribing duties for the government of railroads, to prevent accidents and injuries. The court uses the following language: "A train pulled by a small engine called a 'dummy,' although exclusively engaged in carrying passengers, is a railroad, within the meaning of the statute prescribing precautions to be observed by railroads. The evil intended to be remedied pertains as much to this sort of railways as to the ordinary railroads of commerce." We cite the case as an authority fully in accord with the conclusion reached by a majority of this court. It is unnecessary for us to go further than the principles declared in our opinion, supra; and consequently we express no opinion as to whether, under our statutes, dummy engines operated wholly within and under municipal control are subject to the general laws governing railroad companies as defined in section 1178, Code 1886.

Reversed and remanded.

Stone, Ch. J.:

The intestate of plaintiff in the court below, Peter Jacobs, was in charge, as engineer, of a dummy engine and train of two cars, which was making a trip over the dummy line between Birmingham and Ensley City. The track of that line crosses the track of the appellant corporation, and, at the crossing, intestate, while at his post of duty, was struck and killed by a train which was being pushed backward over the track of the Birmingham Mineral Railroad Company. The suit is against the railroad corporation, and charges that the collision and injury resulted from the negligence of the Birmingham Mineral Company. Possibly the most important charge of negligence consists in the alleged fact that the train of the Birmingham Mineral was not brought to a full stop within 100 feet of the crossing of the railroad and dummy tracks. Code 1886, § 1145. One defense to the action is contributory negligence. The trial court, in its rulings, treated the dummy line as a railroad, within the meaning of section 1145 aforesaid. There was a recovery in favor of the plaintiff.

It is contended for the appellant corporation that a dummy line is not a railroad, within the meaning of the Statute, and that therefore it owed no duty to bring its train to a full stop before crossing the dummy track. If this point be well taken, there can be no question that the circuit court erred in several of its rulings. But, as we do not intend to consider this question until we shall have disposed of the other questions raised, we need say no more on this point at this place.

Moving in the direction the appellant's train was coming, it would first encounter, and must needs cross, the main track of the Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham Railroad Company. Between that track and the track of the dummy line is a space of only 325 feet. The approaching train consisted of 14 cars besides the engine and tender,—much longer than the space between the two tracks. The uncontroverted testimony is that, if the train had stopped at any point within 100 feet of the dummy track, its rear section would have overlapped the track of the Kansas City, Memphis & Birmingham track by four or five car-lengths,—more than 100 feet. This, it is contended, must operate an exception to the statutory requirement, and relieve the Railroad Company from the duty of stopping before crossing the second track. The Statute in question is a very wise and humane exercise of the state's police power. It is of very easy observance; and, if faithfully and thoughtfully conformed to, no such thing as a collision of trains at a railroad crossing could occur. Each train must come to a full stop within 100 feet of the crossing before attempting to cross. It must not only be brought to a full stop, but it must "not proceed until they know the way to be clear." The Statute then declares which road shall have the preference in crossing,—the one having "the older right of way." So the duty of learning that the way is clear before proceeding is equally as binding as is the command to come to a full stop. The purpose of the required stop is that the situation may be taken in; and if the officer or agent having control of a train were merely to go through the perfunctory ceremony of coming to a stop, and were then to proceed without informing himself that the way is clear, he would be as derelict in duty as if he had not brought his train to a stop. We cannot adopt the interpretation contended for. It is not within our province to disregard so positive language of the Legislature, nor do we think policy points in that direction. To disregard the Statute is to make collisions possible, if not probable. To obey it is to render them impossible. If it were made a highly penal offense in all persons controlling trains who fail to observe this statutory enactment, such collisions would probably be much less frequent.

The first count of the complaint charges that the defendant, "by and through its conductor, engineer, servants and agents, negligently, wantonly, recklessly and willfully caused, permitted and suffered its said train to run into and against the said engine upon which plaintiff's intestate was as aforesaid, knocking it off the track, and so scalding, bruising and wounding plaintiff's intestate that he died in consequence thereof." This count in terms charges that the defendant's train was willfully caused to be "run into and against the said engine" of the dummy line. There is no testimony tending to show that the collision was "willfully caused" by defendant's servants, but the trend of the whole testimony repels such inference. The defendant's sixth charge, which was refused, was confined to the first count of the complaint, and in effect asserts that the plaintiff failed to establish the truth of that count. This is the identical question which was raised and ruled on in Johnston's Case, 79 Ala. 486. While the point may be somewhat technical, we do not feel at liberty to depart from the ruling then made. The sixth charge asked ought to have been given. Dickson's Case, 88 Ill. 431; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 51, 63; Coulton's Case, 86 Ala. 129; Guinan's Case, 11 Lea, 98. The second count does not charge that the defendant willfully caused the collision. The charge is that the train was willfully run at a high rate of speed "towards and to said crossing." This is an entirely different question, which does not fall within the rule declared in Johnston's Case, supra.

We recur to the question first raised: Was the Ensley Railway a railroad, within the meaning of section 1145 of the Code of 1886? Was its track such a one as that, before crossing it, the train of the defendant railroad must be brought to a "full stop," with no authority to proceed until those having it in charge knew the way to be clear? This question, it would seem, does not necessarily depend on a partial resemblance of the Ensley Railway to railroads proper. It depends on the will and intention of the Legislature, to be gathered from its language. Much light will be shed on this subject by tracing our legislative history which bears upon it. The clause which now constitutes section 1145 of the Code of 1886 was enacted December 10, 1864. Sess. Acts 1865-66, p. 77. That clause has undergone no change since its enactment, with this exception. When first enacted, the train was required to be brought to a full stop within 50 feet of every railroad crossing. The Code of 1886, § 1145, fixes the maximum of the distance at 100 feet. There is much testimony tending to show that the train of the Birmingham Mineral Railroad Company which collided with the dummy engine, of which deceased was the engineer, was not brought to a full stop within 100 feet of the track of the Ensley Railway. So, if the Ensley Railway was at the time of the collision (February 22, 1889) a railroad, within the meaning of the Statute, the jury were not without testimony on which to find that that feature of plaintiff's case was made good. Our statutory provisions in reference to the government, regulation and supervision of railroads have been of steady growth, dating far beyond the introduction of dummy engines as tractors of street-cars. They are embodied in the Code of 1886, commencing with section 1120 and ending with section 1178. The whole of chapter 2, title 12, pt.

1 of the Code, is devoted to this subject. What is now section 1144 of the Code of 1886 was enacted February 6, 1868. Sess. Acts, 15. It constitutes section 1899 of the Code of 1867, and section 1699 of the Code of 1876. Section 1145, as we have seen, was approved December 10, 1864. In the Code of 1867 it is section 1408, and in the Code of 1876, § 1703. On December 29, 1868 (Sess. Acts, 462), the law was approved requiring railroad companies to erect at each crossing of a public road a sign, "with large and distinct letters," giving notice of the proximity of the railroad, etc. This Statute is embodied in section 1722 of the Code of 1876, and is section 1146 of the Code of 1886. One provision of the Act approved December 10, 1864, requires that "the chief superintendent of every railroad shall instruct the engineers and conductors thereof as to the provisions of" what now are §§ 1144, 1145, of the Code of 1886. Code 1867, § 1405; Code 1876, § 1703. So, in the Act approved December 29, 1868, it was provided "that every railroad company in this State shall cause all its trains of cars for passengers to stop upon each arrival at a station advertised by such company as a station for receiving passengers upon such trains at least one half of one minute." This is section 1721 of the Code of 1876; section 1157 of the Code of 1886. Railroads must have proper depot accommodations "at each of the passenger stations along the line of the railroad." Sess. Acts 1868-69, p. 154, 1868-69, p. 74; Code 1886, § 1154. The Act creating a railroad commission for the State of Alabama was approved February 26, 1881. Sess. Acts, 84. Its title is, "To Provide for the Regulation of All Railroad Companies and Persons Operating Railroads in This State." It was certainly intended to apply, and does apply, to all railroads in the State, as the Legislature understood that phrase. The powers it confers on the commissioners are comprehensive. They are embodied in the Code of 1886, §§ 1120 to 1143, inclusive.

To comment on all the statutory provisions relating to the railroad commissioners and their powers which apparently shed light on the question we are now considering, would swell this opinion unduly. To be fully comprehended the entire Statute must be read. Certain provisions of that Statute, as well as many statutory provisions noted above, seem not to be properly adapted to street railroads or dummy lines, which, as a rule, are constructed for the transportation of passengers for short and irregular distances. We will mention only some of the most striking provisions, in the enactment of which the Legislature, it would seem, could not have intended their application to street railways, whether drawn by a dummy engine or otherwise. Section 1145 of the Code requires trains to be brought to a full stop before crossing another track. There could be no question that the difficulty if not the impossibility of stopping an ordinary train of cars on an ordinary railroad within any short distance, and the consequent danger of a collision, supplied the motive of this enactment. That reason cannot apply to a dummy engine and its train, which, under all the testimony, can be stopped in from 10 to 30 feet. Any one reading sections 1144, 1146, 1154, 1161, 1164, will readily perceive their inapplicability to street railways, even though drawn by a dummy engine; and it is not perceived how section 1148 can be made to apply to street railways. If street railways whose cars are drawn by dummy engines are there by constituted railroads under our general statutory system, then they must be brought under all the legislative enactments for the government of railroads. This will subject them not alone to the legislative provisions noted above. Its influence has a much wider sweep. They would cease to be taxable as the great bulk of property is taxed, but must be assessed under section 494 of the Code by the state board of assessment, with all the formality required in that section. Does the reason which caused that enactment apply to street railways and dummy lines?

Again, if they are railroads under our Statutes, they are under the power and jurisdiction of the railroad commission. Code, § 1129. They would be required to pay a license tax, and their share of the expenses of the railroad commission, to be ascertained by the auditor. Code, § 1128. It would subject their tracks to supervision by the railroad commissioners, and require them to transport the commissioners free of charge. Section 1129. Their tariff would be subject to revision by the commissioners. Section 1130. Can it be possible that dummy lines are subject to the provisions requiring railroads to have "at each of the passenger stations along the line of its railroad . . . sufficient sitting or waiting rooms . . . for passengers waiting for trains, having regard to sex and race, which shall be suitably heated in cold weather and supplied with sufficient fresh drinking water, when passengers waiting for trains are present, and with sufficient and comfortable seats?" Section 1154. Confining the legislation we are discussing to railroads proper, every clause in the 54 sections (1120-1173, inclusive) is germane and proper. Extending it so as to take in street railway service, no matter how propelled, we are forced to declare that many of the more important provisions of the Statute are wholly unsuited to the new service assigned them. We are on safe ground when we give to the Statutes such operation as the Legislature had, and could only have had in contemplation when the Statutes were enacted. We should hesitate before extending them to conditions essentially dissimilar. The difficulties of interpretation extend farther than is suggested above. If street railways which employ dummy engines as motors are railroads, what are similar roads whose coaches are propelled by electricity or by animal power? The tracks are alike, and the coaches, supported on flanged wheels, run only on the rails, as do the coaches of railroads proper. Are some street railways "railroads," under our statutory system, and others not? And, if so, what class or classes are included, and what excluded? But we are not left in doubt as to what the Legislature intended. The statutory provisions in reference to the incorporation of railroads commence with section 1573 of the Code of 1886. There must be at least seven corporators, and the declaration must be filed with the secretary of state. Section 1574. The secretary of state issues the commission to open books of subscription (§ 1578), and keeps a record of it (§ 1579). Such corporations have very many and large powers peculiar to railroads proper, which are wholly unadapted to dummy lines. To state them in detail would swell this opinion to unreasonable dimensions.

We invite attention to the following sections of the Code: 1580-1583, 1586, 1588, and 1594. And we also invite attention to constitutional provisions. Street railway companies are treated as a separate subject, and a chapter of the Code is devoted to it, commencing with section 1603. Five or more persons constitute the requisite number of subscribers to obtain such incorporation. Section 1604. The judge of probate issues the commission for opening books of subscription (§ 1605), and the record of the proceedings is made and kept in his office (§ 1607). The powers of the corporation are set forth in section 1608, and are essentially unlike those conferred on railroad corporations proper. These statutory provisions are in several respects unlike those theretofore in force. Code 1876, § 1917 et seq. At the session of the Legislature of 1886-87 before the publication of the Code of 1886, several of the statutory provisions found in the Code of 1876 were changed. By Act approved December 10, 1886, p. 123, street railways were given the right to condemn private property to corporate purposes. By Act approved February 25, 1887, p. 144, sections 1918 and 1921 of the Code of 1876 were very materially changed. The language of these sections before the amendment authorized such incorporations only "in any of the cities or towns of this State." The amendment enlarged the privilege, and authorized the formation of such corporations "for the purpose of constructing and using a street railroad in, or in and near, or between any of the cities or towns of this State." This is, in point of time, the first legislative authority for constructing a street railroad outside of a city or town. It cannot operate on any railroads except street railroads, for its caption is, "To amend sections 1918 and 1921 of the Code" and those sections are in the article of the Code devoted exclusively to "street railroad companies." Any attempt, under that caption, to legislate on any subject other than that of sections amended,—street railroads,—would render the enactment unconstitutional and inoperative. Ex parte Reynolds, 87 Ala. 188; Ex parte Covert (Ala.) 9 So. Rep. 225.

There was a further amendment of sections 1917 and 1923 of the Code of 1876 by Act approved February 28, 1887. Sess. Acts, 149. The effect of this amendment was to reduce the requisite number of subscribers or promoters of a street railroad corporation from five to three. All of these enactments have special reference to street railroads, and cannot, by the most latitudinous construction, be made applicable to railroads in the larger sense. It will be remembered that the collision which caused the death of plaintiff's intestate occurred February 22, 1889. Six days afterwards (February 28, 1889) the Act was approved. "To Amend and Enlarge the Character of the Ensley Railway, and to Confer Additional Powers on Said Corporation." Sess. Acts, 1020. That Act, among other things, declares that "the Ensley Railway shall have and possess all the rights, powers, privileges and immunities by the general laws of this State conferred on railroad companies." Why was that Act necessary, or considered necessary, if the Ensley Railway was already a "railroad" under the general laws of the State regulating railroads proper?

In the recent excellent work on Roads and Streets by Elliott (pp. 580, 587 et seq.), there will be found a very full, and in many respects an able, discussion of the proper classification of street railways which extend beyond the city limits, and in some cases connect one city with another. That work, however, had mainly two aims in handling the question: first, to ascertain whether the construction of a street railway along a public street is the imposition of a new servitude, for which the owner of the ultimate fee is entitled to additional compensation; and, second, to what extent the use of steam as a tractor enters into the inquiry. The conclusion is reached that the street railways which employ only animal power impose no additional servitude which justifies the demand of additional compensation, but, if steam be used, then the increase of annoyance and danger consequent upon it calls for further damages. It is further stated as a reason for a distinction that street railways whose cars are moved only by animals are not clothed with any powers of eminent domain, whereas those which employ steam may condemn private property for their use. Eminent domain is purely an attribute of the sovereignty, and can be exercised alone by it or by some person, natural or artificial, under legislative grant of the power. With the exception of a single provision for private roads in the Constitution of Alabama (art. 1, § 24), it is only in promotion of enterprises of a public nature that the sovereignty can exercise, or grant the power to another to exercise, the right of eminent domain. Sadler v. Langham, 34 Ala. 811. Can it be maintained that street railways, even those extending from city to city, if their cars be moved by steam-power, possess this element of public benefit which authorizes them to invoke and employ the sovereign power of eminent domain, while the less pretentious horse or mule car can aspire to no such eminence? No person, natural or artificial, can assert the power of eminent domain, unless that power is conferred by legislative grant, and in some matter which has in itself an element of acknowledged public benefit. Can it be affirmed that street railways which employ steam as a motor possess that element, and that those which employ horses or mules do not? Is not the true inquiry, at last, whether the service accommodates the public with a ready and inexpensive means of transportation, within the area of customary business calls, and whether the Legislature has conferred upon it the power of eminent domain?

We have traced this legislative history for the purpose of showing that from the inception two systems have been declared,—one for the regulation of railroads proper, and the other for the regulation of street railways. That there is a natural, inherent, organic difference in the two systems, and their wants, we need scarcely assert. Is it not necessarily true that, if some of the provisions in reference to railroads apply to dummy lines, all must apply to them? By what statutory authority can we apply regulations to one which are designed for the other? And, if we do so apply them, to what extent shall the application be made? Who shall determine this question, and by what criterion shall it be determined? Is it not safer to leave this delicate duty to the law-making power? It may be that it would be wiser and safer to require railroad trains to be brought to a full stop before crossing a dummy track. Let the Legislature determine that grave question.

Whether, at the time of the injury complained of in this suit, the track of the Ensley Railway Company was a "railroad," within the meaning of section 1145 of the Code, is a question on which the members of this court are not agreed. It is contended by the majority of the court, as shown in Judge Coleman's opinion, that section 1178 of the Code tends to support their view. That section declares that, "unless clearly otherwise apparent from the context, the term 'railroad company,' as used in this chapter, includes any person or corporation owning or operating a railroad." I think that section has nothing to do with the question. My own opinion is that the only object of that section was to fasten responsibility on any person or corporation operating a railroad, whether such person or corporation owned the road or not. Under its provisions, any person having a cause of action traceable to the running of the road, or handling of its rolling stock, is not necessarily confined to the corporation as chartered or to the owner of the road for redress. He may proceed against any person or corporation operating the road, if the grievance complained of was suffered at the hands of such person or corporation, although not the owner of the track. It is common knowledge that railroads are sometimes operated under lease, and that two or more railroad companies sometimes, under an arrangement between themselves, use the same track for a part of their respective lines. Under this section of the Statute, liability attaches to the particular person or corporation whose breach of conduct or tort is complained of. My own opinion is that section 1145 of the Code is a strong argument in favor of my position. Under its terms, it is shown that it was not intended to apply to the Ensley Railway Company. This is "clearly apparent from the context." That section is part and parcel of the system established for the government of railroads proper, as we have heretofore shown. It is both preceded and followed by statutory provisions which are palpably inapplicable to the Ensley Railway or any other dummy line. This is the context which makes it clearly apparent that the provisions of the chapter in which section 1145 is found do not and cannot apply to the Ensley Railway. On the other hand, the Ensley Railway was incorporated, not under the Statutes devoted to railroads and their regulation, but under an amendment of the Statutes devoted specially and separately to street railways and their regulation. How can the conclusion be resisted that the context clearly shows that none of the provisions found in the system devoted to railroads proper are applicable to street railways or dummy lines which are chartered under and governed by an entirely different statutory system, with entirely different objects, powers, regulations and methods of service?

If regulations enacted for railroads are applicable to street railways and dummy lines, why are not the regulations of street railways and dummy lines equally applicable to railroads proper? Should not the rule work both ways, to be consistent?

My own opinions are expressed above, and Judge Clopton concurs with me. The opinion of the majority of the court is expressed by Judge Coleman. According to that opinion, there is no error in the rulings of the circuit court, save the single one pointed out above.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

John Peter EISENLORD, Appt.,

v.

David H. CLUM et al., Respts.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. The mother of an alleged illegitimate son has no "interest in the event" which makes her incompetent under Code Civ. Proc. § 829, to testify to the fact of her marriage with his father in an action by the son to enforce his claim as an heir of his father.

2. A judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter is not competent evidence against her son in an action to enforce his claim to be the lawful heir of such judgment defendant.

NOTE.—Exclusion of testimony against decedent on ground of interest.

No person is now disqualified as a witness because of interest, except in certain cases enumerated in the Code, and whoever asserts the existence of the 12 L. R. A. disqualification must point out the way in which the exception lies. Code Civ. Proc. § 829; Staples v. Fairchild, 8 N. Y. 41; Van Alstyne v. Erwine, 11 N. Y. 381, 341; Lobdell v. Lobdell, 36 N. Y. 337.

At common law the agent was not incompetent

3. A man's declarations that he is married and that a certain child is his son and heir, although not admissible to prove marriage as part of the res gestæ when he never lived or cohabited with the alleged wife and never had anything to do with the son, are admissible as hearsay evidence concerning pedigree, on the question of the legitimacy of the son.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third department, affirming a judgment of the Montgomery County Circuit in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. J. Abbott, for appellant:

The mother of the plaintiff was a competent witness for all purposes, under section 828 of the Code. Her testimony could not be excluded unless brought within the exceptions contained in said section 829. She had no such "interest" such as contemplated by that section.

Jackson v. Bard, 4 Johns. 280; Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144; Van Rensselaer v. Kearny, 52 U. S. 11 How. 297, 18 L. ed. 708; Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. 481; Hobart v. Hobart, 63 N. Y. 80; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 890; Sanford v. Ellithrop, 95 N. Y. 48.

The court erred upon the trial in excluding the testimony as to admissions and declarations of Dr. Eisenlod, in his lifetime, from time to time, emphatically going to prove that he had been married in his lifetime to Margaret Lipe, the plaintiff's mother, and that the plaintiff was his son and heir.

Reynold's Stephen, Ev. pp. 42-54; Abbott, Tr. Ev. pp. 89-91, §§ 82-84, and cases cited; Cow. & Hill's notes, p. 623, note 469, and cases there cited; Blackburn v. Crawford, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 175, 18 L. ed. 186; Gaines v. New Orleans, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 642, 18 L. ed. 950.

The record of a judgment in the supreme court in an action between John A. Lipe, plaintiff, against Peter O. Eisenlod, defendant, brought by Lipe against the doctor for the seduction of Lipe's daughter, Margaret Lipe, mother of the plaintiff in this action, was not admissible.

6 Walt. Act. and Def. 680, § 8, citing Lansing v. Montgomery, 2 Johns. 882; Id. 681, § 6, 767, § 2, 770, § 4, 771, § 5, 784, §§ 25, 26, 785, §§ 27, 28; 787, 788, art. 2, § 1, 802, § 8.

Mr. George W. Smith, with Messrs. Morrell & Spraker, for respondent:

The judgment in the case of Lipe v. Eisenlod established the status of Margaret and Eisenlod, and that Margaret was the servant of John Lipe, and unmarried, and she so testified in that action.

Clemens v. Clemens, 37 N. Y. 59; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 525; Eisenlod v. Eisenlod, 49 Hun. 840; Pray v. Hegeman, 98 N. Y. 351.

The marital relation could not be established by declarations of Eisenlod. There was no cohabitation, no apparent marital relation, and therefore no basis for allowing the testimony to characterize it.

Re Taylor, 9 Paige, 617, 4 L. ed. 839; Van as a witness because of interest in an action to which his principal was a party, where no question of exceeding his powers as agent was involved. Bailey v. Ogden, 3 Johns. 890, 420; 1 Greenl. Ev. 13th ed. § 418; Lowber v. Shaw, 5 Mason, 241; Rice v. Gove, 23 Pick. 158, 33 Am. Dec. 724; Walwright v. Straw, 15 Vt. 216; Gilpin v. Howell, 5 Pa. 41, 45 Am. Dec. 730; Hoffman v. Delahanty, 13 Abb. Fr. 368; Lytle v. Bond, 40 Vt. 618.

Since the change in the law in which the disqualification of interest was removed, no more stringent rule is applied now than when the common law existed in its rigor. Hildebrand v. Crawford, 65 N. Y. 107; Hobart v. Hobart, 63 N. Y. 80; Sherman v. Scott, 27 Hun. 381; Parker v. McCunn, 2 N. Y. Week. Dig. 502; Wallace v. Strans, 113 N. Y. 238.

The interest that will disqualify a witness under section 899 of the Code must be present, certain and vested, not uncertain, remote or contingent, and must be in the event of the action, not alone in the questions involved. It must be such that he will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment of the court disposing of the facts in dispute. Moore v. Oviatt, 35 Hun. 216; Greenl. Ev. § 890; Steele v. Ward, 30 Hun. 555; Miller v. Montgomery, 78 N. Y. 238; Hobart v. Hobart, 63 N. Y. 80; Riddle v. Dixon, 3 Pa. 372, 44 Am. Dec. 207, 210, note.

The provisions excluding personal transactions with a deceased person are only enforced where the case is brought strictly within the wording of the Statute; it is not enough that it is within its spirit. Severn v. National State Bank of Troy, 18 Hun. 223.

It is error to hold that personal communications between the witness and deceased cannot be proved for any purpose. Such evidence can only be excluded when it conflicts with the provisions of the Statute. Hobart v. Hobart, 63 N. Y. 80.

The section does not render a party incompetent as a witness for all purposes, even in an action by an administrator, but only as to personal transactions or communications between the witness and the deceased. Ham v. Van Orden, 84 N. Y. 237.

The primary intent of the prohibition is very apparent, and is to prevent a surviving party from proving by his own testimony a personal transaction or communication between himself and the deceased person, which but for the prohibition he might do without fear or possibility of contradiction. Pinney v. Orth, 88 N. Y. 447-451.

Extent of the prohibition.

It has been repeatedly held that the prohibition does not extend to conversations had between the deceased and third persons which were overheard and listened to by the witnesses. Hildebrand v. Crawford, 65 N. Y. 111; Simmons v. Simson, 26 N. Y. 277; Cary v. White, 59 N. Y. 383.

Fact must be proved directly.

A fact that cannot be proved by a party or interested person directly cannot be established inferentially from his testimony. Grey v. Grey, 47 N. Y. 552; McCotter v. Lawrence, 4 Hun. 107; Johnson v. Spies, 5 Hun. 468; Jacques v. Elmore, 7 Hun. 675; Burnett v. Noble, 5 Bedf. 69; Fisher v. Verplanck, 17 Hun. 120.

Strict construction usually given to section 899.

A question has often arisen as to the strictness with which section 899 should be construed. In one class of cases it has often been held that if persons whose testimony is offered are clearly within the reason and spirit of the law, it is sufficient to exclude their testimony. Dewey v. Goodenough, 56 Barb. 54; Mattoon v. Young, 45 N. Y. 696; Timon v. Claffy, 45 Barb. 438; Van Tuij v. Van Tuij, 37 Barb. 336;

Tuyl v. Van Tuyl, 57 Barb. 235; Bishop, Mar. and Div. §§ 438, 439, 541.

The offer of the plaintiff to give the testimony of Mrs. Austin as to personal transactions with the deceased was properly rejected.

Code Civ. Proc. § 829; Eisenlord v. Eisenlord, supra; Lyon v. Snyder, 61 Barb. 172; Morrill, Comp. Witnesses, 28; Re Wilson, 4 Cent. Rep. 769, 103 N. Y. 374; Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239.

The evidence rejected as to the declarations only relates to "a wife" not named, and to the child, except that of Flanders. He is the only witness that mentions Margaret Lipe as the wife. He says the declaration was that Eisenlord said that he "had a wife; that he had Margaret Lipe"—even this does not assert the fact in question.

Jaques v. Public Administrator, 1 Bradf. 508; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 71 N. Y. 426; Badger v. Badger, 83 N. Y. 555; Harbeck v. Harbeck, 3 Cent. Rep. 430, 103 N. Y. 714; *Com. v. Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brings this action of ejectment as the son and sole heir-at-law of one Peter O. Eisenlord, who died in Montgomery County on the 30th day of June, 1885, seised in fee-simple and possessed of the premises described in the complaint. The defendants other than Clum are, respectively, the brothers, sisters or nieces of the deceased, Eisenlord, and claim that they are his sole heirs-at-law, and the defendant Clum is in possession of the premises described in the complaint, and claims under the other defendants as tenant. The plaintiff is the son of one Margaret Lipe, and the question in issue depends upon whether she was married to the deceased, Eisenlord, prior to this son's birth. He endeavored to prove an actual marriage between the deceased and his mother prior to his birth, on the 21st of October, 1857, and for that purpose called, among others, his mother, then married to one Austin. The plaintiff offered to prove by her various conversations between the witness and the deceased upon the subject of their getting married, and also offered to prove by her the performance of the marriage ceremony between them, by a justice of the peace in Montgomery County, at a time anterior to the plaintiff's birth. All the evidence was objected to by defendants' counsel, and was excluded by the court, upon the ground that the witness was interested, and came within the provisions of section 829 of the Code; because, if she established the fact that she was married to the deceased, she would then be entitled to dower in this real estate. The witness was not a party to the action, and hence could not be excluded as having any interest on that ground. Nor was she a person from, through, or under whom the plaintiff derived any title or interest by assignment or otherwise. His title or interest, if any, came through Eisenlord, and that, of course, depended upon the question whether the plaintiff was his legitimate son. The only other ground of exclusion contemplated by the Statute refers to a person "interested in the event" of the action. Prior to the adoption of the Code, the law excluded interested witnesses from testifying. What amounted to such an interest as would exclude a witness was a question which was frequently presented, and in every conceivable phase, and the courts had finally settled down to a general rule on the subject, which had long prevailed before the Legislature altered it. At common law, as the rule became developed by successive decisions, the interested witness was excluded

Howell v. Taylor, 11 Hun, 214; Andrews v. New York Nat. Bank of North America, 7 Hun, 20; Schoonmaker v. Wolford, 20 Hun, 166.

While in another class of cases it is held that it is not enough that a case be within the spirit, it must be within the letter, of the Statute. Lobdell v. Lobdell, 36 N. Y. 327; Re Le Baron, 67 How. Pr. 346; Severn v. National State Bank of Troy, 13 Hun, 223.

Declarations as to marriage.

In civil suits, the declarations and admissions of the husband and wife are generally admissible to prove their marriage (Jones v. Reddick, 79 N. C. 200. And see Truman's Case, 1 East, P. C. 470; Woods v. Woods, 2 Curt. Ecol. 518; Reg. v. Creamer, 10 L. C. Rep. 404; Patterson v. Gaines, 47 U. S. 6 How. 550, 12 L. ed. 553; Gaines v. Reif, 53 U. being admissions against interest (see Greenawalt v. McEnelley, 85 Pa. 352); and in any case, being part of the res gestae of cohabitation and repute. See Guardians v. Nathans, 3 Brewst. 142, 172; Stewart, Mar. and Div. § 132.

Hearsay evidence as to pedigree.

But it is now settled, that the law resorts to hearsay evidence in cases of pedigree, upon the ground of the interest of the declarations in the person from whom the descent is made out, and their consequent interest in knowing the connections of the family. The rule of admission is therefore restricted to the declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage to the person, and therefore interested in the succession in question. Yowles v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140; Goodright v. Moss, 2 Cowp. 591, as expounded by Lord Edmonstone, in Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. Jr. 514; Johnson v. Lawson, 2 Bing. 86; *Monkton v. only when he had what was termed a "legal interest" in the event of the action. A direct and certain interest in the event of the cause, or an interest in the record, for the purpose of evidence, became necessary in order to exclude. Starkie, Ev. (9th ed. 1849) marg. pp. 23, 24. The inclination of the courts was that the fact of interest should go to the credit, rather than the competency, of the witness, and hence they said that the party alleging incompetency must show it beyond doubt. The English legislation interfered with the rule as to the record, and provided that it should not be evidence in another action for or against the witness who testified. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. chap. 42, § 26. Then, under the suggestion of Lord Denman, another Act was passed limiting very greatly the cases in which a person should be excluded by reason of interest. 6 & 7 Vict. chap. 85.

In this State the question arose at an early date, and in one of the pioneer cases (Van Nuy's v. Terkune, 3 Johns. Cas. 82) the rule, as above stated, was declared as the law. It was therein explained that a witness was not interested in the event of the cause unless he would gain or lose by the event, and he was not interested by the record, unless the verdict could be given in evidence for or against him in some other proceeding. In a note to this case it is stated that the rule was formerly that an interest in the question put to the witness excluded him, but it was admitted that such rule had been explained away and limited, so that the one announced in the case was the true rule. This case was decided in 1802. In Jackson v. Bard, 4 Johns. 230, it was held that the widow of one Dickenson, who was the mediate grantor under whom the defendant claimed the land in question, was a competent witness, although it was argued she might claim dower in case the deed had not been executed. The supreme court held the decision correct, and said she was not an interested witness, because the verdict in the cause could never be given in evidence in an action of dower brought by her. Then in Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, which was an action of ejectment, it was distinctly held that the widow of a person deceased was a competent witness in an action brought by the heir to recover the possession of lands claimed under her husband, though she would be entitled to dower in such land. Van Ness, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and said the witness had no other interest in the case than that which grew out of her right of dower in the premises, and as to that the verdict in the cause would be no evidence in a suit to be brought by her for the recovery of her dower. In Jackson v. Nelson, 6 Cow. 248, it was held that, in an action of ejectment against a devisee, a co-devisee and tenant in common with the defendant, not in actual possession, might be a witness for defendant, because the effect of a recovery by the plaintiff would not be to turn him out of any possession, nor could the verdict be evidence for or against him in any other suit. Again, in Jackson v. Brooks, 8 Wend. 426, 431, an action of ejectment, it was held that a tenant by the curtesy was a competent witness for the plaintiff, who was the heir-at-law. The court said the witness could not use the verdict, if the plaintiff recovered, as evidence in his favor in any suit he might bring to enforce his title as tenant by the curtesy, and hence he had but an interest in the question, and not in the event of the suit. See also Peake, Ev. (Norris' notes) p. 209, pt. 1, chap. 3, § 3; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 886 et seq. The interest must be certain, direct, not contingent or remote, or a mere possible benefit.

Under the rule of the common law on the subject of interest it is plain that the mother in this case would have been a competent witness. She had no "interest in the event of the suit," as that expression had been defined by the courts, and the judgment would not have been any evidence for or against her in any action she might bring. I think the expression "interest in the event," as used in our Statute, was never intended to enlarge the class to be ex-

Proof by one of the family that a younger brother of the person last seized had many years before gone abroad, and that the repute of the family was that he had died there, and that the witness had never heard in the family of his having been married, has been admitted as good prima facie evidence of such person's death without lawful issue. Doe v. Griffin, supra.

Evidence of hearsay may be given to prove a pedigree. The declarations of persons uninterested, and who are then dead, are admissible. Strickland v. Poole, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 14, 1 L. ed. 17; Stein v. Bowman, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 209, 10 L. ed. 129.

Evidence admitted from necessity.

From necessity, in cases of pedigree, hearsay evidence is admissible. But this rule is limited to the members of the family who may be supposed to have known the relationship which existed in the different branches. The declaration of these individuals, they being dead, may be given in evidence to prove pedigree. And so is reputation, which is the hearsay of those who may be supposed to have known the fact, handed down from one to another as evidence. As evidence of this description must vary with the circumstances of each case, it is difficult, if not impracticable, to deduce from the books any precise and definite rule on the subject. Stein v. Bowman, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 209, 10 L. ed. 129.

cluded under it beyond what the common law excluded in using the same language. All legislation on the subject has been in favor of greater liberality in the rules relating to the competency of witnesses. Upon referring to the cases which have been decided under the section of the Code already referred to, we find that the rule defining what is an interest in the event is laid down in about the same terms as those used by the common law. Hobart v. Hobart, 69 N. Y. 80; Nearpass v. Gilman, 104 N. Y. 506, 6 Cent. Rep. 667; Wallace v. Straus, 118 N. Y. 288; Connelly v. O'Connor, 117 N. Y. 91. But the learned general term, upon the appeal in this case, has held that the exclusion was proper on the ground that the judgment would furnish the witness with important evidence to establish her claim to dower in the premises described in the complaint. The cases I have cited show conclusively that such a judgment would not have been admissible in evidence at common law in any such action, either for or against the witness, and in this respect the Code has not changed the rule.

The case of Miller v. Montgomery, 78 N. Y. 282, is cited to show that the record would be legal evidence for or against her. A surety upon the bond of a nonresident executor was there held to be interested in the event of the accounting of his principal. This was so held because the surety is bound by the decree of the surrogate made upon a regular accounting, and such decree would be evidence against the surety in a suit upon the bond. Within all rules, such a witness is interested, and is incompetent to testify to a personal transaction with the deceased. The general term also thought the judgment would be evidence as a declaration or admission by the plaintiff of the facts, or some of them, which the witness would have to prove in her action against him for dower. Any declaration or admission made by the plaintiff as to any fact material for the witness to prove in her action is undoubtedly admissible as an admission. If found in a pleading, and it be shown that it was placed there with the knowledge and sanction of the plaintiff herein, such pleading would be admissible for the purpose of proving the admission. Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156. In order, however, to prove such admission, it is not necessary or proper to put in evidence the judgment in the action, for it is not the judgment which furnishes the proof, but the admission contained in the pleadings, and the judgment is not in that case the least evidence in favor of the witness in any action she might bring. The admission would exist without the judgment, and regardless of it.

That the witness has an interest in the question is very plain, but I am aware of no principle that would permit the introduction of this judgment as any proof for or against the witness in any other action. I see no foundation for any estoppel as against the plaintiff herein in an action brought by the witness to recover her dower. If, as I say, he has made admissions, they may be proved; but to say that he is estopped in the action for dower from denying any fact upon which the right of the plaintiff in such action depends, because in another action between himself and a third party it was necessary for him to prove the same fact, would be a great extension of the doctrine of estoppel. If, in the course of such first trial, the plaintiff had proved by his own testimony any fact material to the dower action, it would be an admission which could be taken advantage of by proving that it was made; but if the fact had been proved by some third party, instead of by the plaintiff, it is not in that event an admission or declaration of the plaintiff therein which renders a judgment in that action proof against him in any future controversy with a third party. The cases cited from 1 Greenl. Ev. § 527a, are those where it was claimed the party had made an admission in a declaration or other pleading, or had suffered default; and it was held such express admission, or such constructive admission by suffering a default, was competent evidence against him. We do not doubt the correctness of this rule. It is not the judgment which is to form the evidence. It is the admission contained in the pleading or by the suffering of the default. Our conclusion is that the mother of the plaintiff was a competent witness to prove any or all facts of which she was cognizant, and which were material, and which were not inadmissible upon some ground other than the alleged interest of the witness in the event of the action.

2. Another question arises upon the reception in evidence, against the objection of the plaintiff, of the judgment in the action of John A. Lipe v. Peter O. Eisenlord. It was an action brought by Mr. Lipe (who was the father of Margaret Lipe, the mother of the plaintiff in this action) against the defendant on account of his alleged seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, Margaret, and in which action the plaintiff recovered a verdict, on which judgment was entered in his favor. I see no ground upon which to permit its introduction in this action. The plaintiff was no party to it, nor was his mother, Margaret Lipe. The judgment established no status of the plaintiff's mother. As a judgment, it simply established the fact which was conclusive on all parties and privies thereto that, in 1856, the defendant had seduced the plaintiff's daughter Margaret Lipe. Neither the plaintiff nor his mother was a party or privy to it. In that class of judgments, which touch the subject of marriage or divorce, and either establish a marriage or decree a divorce between the parties, it has been held that, under certain circumstances and within proper limitations of jurisdiction, such judgments are binding and of universal obligation. It is upon the same principle that the decree of a court in rem is conclusive upon the title to the res adjudicated upon. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 543, 544, and notes. But this is no such judgment. It adjudges no status, and is conclusive of the facts therein adjudged simply between the parties and privies thereto, and the plaintiff occupies neither position. If the witness had been sworn, and had testified to facts upon this trial which it was claimed were inconsistent with what she swore to on the trial of the seduction case, upon her attention being called thereto, and a proper foundation laid, such contrary and inconsistent declarations or evidence, if material, could have been proved with a view to impeach her evidence upon this trial. We think the judgment spoken of was not admissible in evidence against the plaintiff.

A third question arises upon the exclusion of declarations said to have been made by Eisenlord at times long subsequent to the time when this alleged marriage ceremony took place. One witness was called, and the plaintiff offered to prove by him that Eisenlord had said to him, in 1868 or 1864, that he was married, and had a wife, and that it was Margaret Lipe. The plaintiff offered to prove by another witness that Eisenlord had said he was married, and had an heir,—a son,—the one witness had teased him about, the plaintiff herein. This was in 1867 or 1868. Eisenlord died in 1885. The evidence was objected to as incompetent, and as not characterizing any act or thing which could render it admissible. The objection was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted. The fact is undisputed that the deceased, Eisenlord, and Margaret Lipe never lived together or cohabited as man and wife. No declarations of his could therefore characterize or explain the nature of a cohabitation which confessedly never existed. It is equally undisputed that Eisenlord never had anything to do with this alleged son. They never lived together, and, if they ever met, there is no proof of such fact aside from the possible inference arising from some of the alleged declarations, and they only went to the extent of an inference that Eisenlord had seen the plaintiff. These declarations, therefore, did not in any manner characterize or explain the footing upon which the plaintiff and Eisenlord had ever lived together or even met. Under such circumstances, the question arises as to the admissibility of the proposed evidence for the purpose of proving or as corroborative proof of a marriage in an action of this nature. They would be admissible upon the trial of an action to which the person making them was a party.

It has been held in England, and in some of the States of this Union, that evidence of declarations as to a former marriage was competent in the trial of an indictment for bigamy against the party making them. 1 Wharton, Ev. § 86, and note; Miles v. United States, 108 U. S. 804, 26 L. ed. 481. But in this State it has been held that such evidence was not sufficient in a prosecution for bigamy, to establish a marriage, even against the party making the admissions. People v. Humphrey, 7 Johns. 314; Gahagan v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 878. The court held them admissible to corroborate the proof of the actual marriage. In cases where a cohabitation between a man and woman was proved at the time when the declaration of the parties were made, they have been admitted in evidence, even in the lifetime of the parties making them, upon the principle that they were a part of the res gesta, accompanying, characterizing and explaining the nature of that cohabitation as being matrimonial, rather than meretricious. They were admitted as competent proof corroborative of the claim of a marriage between the parties so cohabiting. It was stated that proof of cohabitation, conduct, reputation, reception in family and in society, holding each other out as husband and wife, all tended to prove a marriage, and that in a perfect case they all combined, the lesser facts attending upon and explaining the material and important fact of cohabitation. These principles are illustrated in the authorities herein cited. 1 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 439; 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. & Edw. notes,) p. 252, note 91; Read v. Passer, 1 Esp. 218; Leader v. Barry, Id. 353; Mathews, Presumptive Ev. 288; Fenton v. Reed, 4 Johns. 53; Re Taylor, 9 Paige, 611, 4 L. ed. 887; O'Gara v. Eisenlohr, 88 N. Y. 296; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 71 N. Y. 428; Badger v. Badger, 88 N. Y. 546.

All these cases do not speak of the principle upon which the declarations were admitted, but it plainly appears that there was cohabitation, and the declarations, reputation, holding themselves out as married persons, etc., all came in as adjuncts to strengthen the inference and to corroborate the presumption of marriage resulting from such cohabitation, and as explanatory thereof, and therefore as part of the res gesta. How far the principle of res gesta extends was somewhat discussed in Badger v. Badger, supra, by Finch, J., but the point here was not decided. I do not see that these declarations, in the face of evidence that there never was any cohabitation between the parties, can be claimed to have been part of the res gesta, even under the most extended definition of that term, and some other ground must be sought for their admission, if they be competent at all.

It seems to me that they are competent as hearsay evidence in a case of pedigree. Such a case is a well-known and recognized exception to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence. This case involves without doubt a question of pedigree simply. It is what is termed in the books a purely genealogical controversy. Peter O. Eisenlord is, upon the plaintiff's claim, the common ancestor of all the parties, while the defendants only deny the plaintiff's relationship to him. The sole question involved is as to this relationship of the plaintiff, and that depends upon the fact of a marriage having taken place between Eisenlord and the plaintiff's mother before his birth. The exception regarding the admission of hearsay evidence in case of a pedigree is not confined to ancient facts, but extends also to matters of pedigree which have recently transpired; and the hearsay as to deceased witnesses is admitted as to facts which have occurred in the presence of living witnesses. 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. & Edw. notes), p. 248; Voules v. Young, 13 Ves. Jr. 140. Matters of pedigree consist of descent and relationship, evidence of declarations of particular facts, such as births, marriages and deaths. 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. & Edw. notes) p. 251. In cases of pedigree, hearsay evidence of persons who from their situation were likely to know, is admissible when the person making them is dead. Jackson v. Cooley, 8 Johns. 123. It is not the question whether such evidence is sufficient to prove the marriage, but only whether it is competent. In many cases it will be readily seen such evidence may, under the circumstances, be the only evidence which can be obtained, and there might be no evidence of cohabitation. In those cases the declarations might be less open to criticism, and entitled to much greater credence, than where the facts were recent, and other evidence readily attainable, if the truth were in that direction. The weight to be given this kind of evidence depends upon the facts surrounding each particular case. It is plain, however, that in cases of pedigree, the declarations, to be admissible, need not be a part of the res gestæ; for, if they were, they would be admissible on that ground, irrespective of any question of their admissibility as in a case of pedigree. The exception to the general rule in the latter case takes a wide range. Traditionary declarations become the best evidence sometimes, when those best acquainted with the fact are dead. When derived from those who are most likely to know the truth, and are under no bias to misrepresent the fact, such evidence affords a reasonable presumption of the truth. Starkie, Ev. 9th Am. ed. 1879, p. 47. Upon questions of pedigree, i. e., in a controversy merely genealogical, hearsay evidence is allowed as to the time of birth of a certain party, as to a marriage, death, legitimacy or the reverse, consanguinity, generally, and particular degrees thereof, and of affinity. Per Knight-Bruce, V. O., in Shields v. Boucher, 1 De G. & S. 40-52. The term "pedigree," says Greenleaf, embraces not only descent and relationship, but also the facts of birth, marriage and death, and the times when these events happened, and the rule permits hearsay evidence of the declarations of deceased members of the family upon these points in any case involving pedigree. 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 103, 104. The declarations, to be admissible, need not be upon the knowledge of the declarant. If this were so, the main object of permitting hearsay evidence would be frustrated, as it seldom happens that the declarations of deceased relations embrace matters within their own personal knowledge. Thus, evidence that a deceased member of the family said that he heard from others of his family the facts which he states is admissible. 1 Whart. Ev. § 205; Doe v. Griffin, 15 East, 298; Doe v. Randall, 2 Moore & P. 20. The evidence is, of course, not rendered less admissible where the declarant knows the fact which he declares. For the purpose of proving a marriage in cases of pedigree, where the object is to trace relationship, the declarations of deceased members of the family are competent. 1 Wharton, Ev. § 212. It has been stated that declarations in regard to particular facts are not competent. This is true in cases where proof of custom, right of way, of common, and the like is offered. But, in a case of pedigree, it is always a particular fact that is to be proved, and in relation to which the declarations of the deceased person are offered, and in such cases the particular facts stated, such as birth (place or time, where material), marriage and death, are competent. 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. & Edw. notes), *251; 1 Wharton, Ev. § 209.

In respect to such proof of particular facts, it has been said that "a birth, however, from a single woman, a birth from a married woman, a death, a marriage, is a particular fact, or a single act, which, of course, is provable by hearsay (hearsay from a proper quarter) on a question of pedigree." Per Vice-Chancellor Knight-Bruce in Shields v. Boucher, supra.

The only case looking to the contrary, that I have found, is Westfield v. Warren, 8 N. J. L. 306, where Ewing, Ch. J., said that, where 12 L. R. A. marriage was to be shown as a substantive, independent fact, it was within none of the exceptions to the general rule, and that hearsay evidence could not be received. The case was one regarding the settlement of a pauper, and might perhaps have been placed upon the ground that it was not a case of pedigree at all.

In Rees v. Erith, 8 East, 589, Chief Justice Ellenborough held, in a case of a settlement of a pauper, that it was not a case of pedigree, but simply a question as to what place an undisputed birth derived from acknowledged parents had taken place in. I think it entirely clear that from the nature of the case, as well as upon authority, a case of pedigree forms an exception to the general rule as to proof of a particular fact by hearsay, reputation or tradition. As to what is a case of pedigree, an examination of the question shows that a case is not necessarily one of that kind, because it may involve questions of birth, parentage, age or relationship. Where these questions are merely incidental, and the judgment will simply establish a debt for a person's liability on a contract, or his proper settlement as a pauper, and things of that nature, the case is not one of pedigree, although questions of marriage, legitimacy, death or birth are incidentally inquired of. Whittuck v. Waters, 4 Car. & P. 375. Thus in Haines v. Guthrie, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 818, it was held, both in the queen's bench division, and in the court of appeal, that declarations of a deceased father were not admissible in evidence to prove the age of his son who had been sued for the price of a horse sold him, and who had set up the defense of infancy. They would have been admissible, the court stated, if the case had been one of pedigree. Prett, M. R., in the course of his opinion in the court of appeal, shows the absence of those facts which make up a case of pedigree; for he says: "What the family of the defendant is, is immaterial; whose son he is, is immaterial; whether he is a legitimate or an illegitimate son is immaterial; and whether he is an elder or a younger son is immaterial; no question of family is raised in the case." It simply involved the point of the age of the defendant for the purpose of thereby determining his liability upon a contract which he had made, and upon which, if of age, he was liable. The judgment would in such case establish no fact in any contest the defendant might have in regard to property depending upon his being a member of his father's family, and his age at any particular time. It was not at all a genealogical controversy, but a mere collateral issue, and hence the rule in pedigree cases did not apply. In the case at bar, however, the case is solely one of pedigree, and the evidence must be judged of with regard to this fact.

The case of Re Taylor, 9 Paige, 611, 4 L. ed. 887, where the chancellor held that the declarations of one of the parties, made after the cohabitation had ceased, could not be admitted in evidence, was not a pedigree case, but only involved the appointment of a committee for the father, who was insane, and such declarations were held inadmissible, as not being a part of the res gestæ.

A careful examination of the question has led me to the conclusion that the evidence of Flanders and Saltzman, regarding Eisenlord's declarations, should have been received as in a case of pedigree. Other evidence, of course, may be offered that may be definite enough to be competent, though most of what was offered, other than that to which I have alluded, was altogether too vague to be admissible. It identified no one, and really amounted to nothing. Although admissible, the evidence is liable to grave suspicion. Indeed, we are bound to say that this whole case presents itself as full of suspicion. The silence of the woman during all these years as to the marriage, silence which was continued until the death of her alleged husband, is, in and of itself, a suspicious fact. Admissions of a marriage are, under such circumstances, most unsatisfactory, and open to grave doubt. If such declarations were in truth ever made, there are many motives which it is impossible to fathom, and which may at the same time operate upon an individual, and induce him to make an admission of this kind when it is wholly untrue. Where the facts are of comparatively recent occurrence, and the alleged declarations of the deceased are at war with his known actions during his life, and where there was no cohabitation or recognition of the party as wife or husband, it may be averred that the evidence is to be looked upon with very great distrust. Still, within the authorities the evidence is competent. Under our rulings there may be evidence enough in the case to require its submission to a jury.

1. Permitting a stairway carpet with holes in it to remain on the stairs of a tenement house with notice of its condition renders the owner liable for injuries to a tenant from a fall caused by catching her foot in one of the holes.
2. The fall of a tenant in a tenement house, caused by a hole in a stair carpet, does not as matter of law show contributory negligence, although she knew of the holes in the carpet and the stairway was well lighted at the time.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the the General Term of the City Court of Brooklyn, reversing a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff and granting a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Fernando Solinger, for appellant:

A landlord who lets rooms in a building to different tenants, with a right of way in common over the staircase, is bound to use reasonable care to keep such staircase in repair; if he fails to do so he is liable to a tenant injured thereby while in exercise of reasonable care.

Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 83; Donohue v. Kendall, 18 Jones & S. 889; Neyer v. Miller, 19 Jones & S. 516; Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 285.

While previous knowledge, by a party injured, of a dangerous situation, or impending danger, from which a person of ordinary intelligence might reasonably apprehend injury, generally imposes upon him greater care and

NOTE.—Of the landlord's liability.

A landlord, whose neglect to use ordinary skill in making repairs on the demised premises causes a personal injury to the tenant, is liable therefor, although his undertaking to make the repairs was gratuitous and by the tenant's solicitation. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477.

It is well settled that, for an injury occasioned by want of due care and skill in doing what one has promised to do, an action may be maintained against him in favor of the party relying on such promise and injured by the breach of it, although there was no consideration for the promise. Ben-den v. Manning, 2 N. H. 239; Thorne v. Deas, 4 Johns. 84; Elisee v. Gatward, 5 T. R. 143; Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 153; Baife v. West, 22 Eng. L. & Eq. 508.

A landlord, having let to different tenants the five tenements with a common passageway, was bound to keep the passageway in repair. Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 83.

But the duty to repair does not include the removal of snow or ice which might accumulate on the passageway, and render the use of it difficult and dangerous. Woods v. Naumkeag Steam Cotton Co. 134 Mass. 367; Watkins v. Goodall, 138 Mass. 433.

It is equally well settled that the landlord is liable to respond to either the tenant or to a stranger for damages arising from either the improper or unworkmanlike construction of the premises. White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Learoyd v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315; McCarthy v. York County Sav. Bank, 74 Me. 315; Nash v. Minneapolis Mill Co. 24 Minn. 501; Godley v. Hagerty, 20 Pa. 387; Kimmell v. Burfeind, 2 Daly, 155; Scott v. Simons, 64 N. H. 426; Gear, Land. and Ten. § 173.

And the same degree of liability attaches to the negligence of the landlord, or of his duly authorized agents, in the care or management of the leasehold premises, so far as the same are under his control. Center v. Davis, 39 Ga. 211; Glickauf v. Maurer, 75 Ill. 239; Milford v. Holbrook, 91 Mass. 17; Learoyd v. Godfrey, 138 Mass. 315; Toole v. Beckett, 67 Me. 544. See Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 63 Me. 552; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507; Jones v. Freidenburg, 66 Ga. 605; Totten v. Phipps, 52 N. Y. 264; Vann v. Rouse, 94 N. Y. 401; Stapenhorst v. American Mfg. Co. 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 856; Lansing v. Stone, 37 Barb. 15; Williams v. Macready, 2 Cin. L. Bull. 272.

Where by either contractual agreement or operation of law it becomes the landlord's duty to make certain repairs, any failure or neglect to per-caution in approaching it, the degree of care required is a question of fact for the jury.

Dowd v. Fitzpatrick, 18 N. Y. Week. Dig. 343; Pomfroy v. Saratoga Springs, 7 Cent. Rep. 44, 104 N. Y. 459, 469; Hawley v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 82 N. Y. 371; Looney v. McLean, supra; Parsons v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 8 L. R. A. 683, 113 N. Y. 864.

The law holds a defendant to stricter accountability if he holds out inducements or makes promises to repair, upon which a person injured has relied.

Laning v. New York Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 536; Palmer v. Dearing, 98 N. Y. 7.

In proving the condition of the carpet at the time of the accident, the evidence that other persons fell on it at about the same time was not improper.

Pomfroy v. Saratoga Springs, supra.

Mr. George F. Elliott, for respondent:

The plaintiff should have been nonsuited, because upon the facts as stated by herself (assuming, but not conceding, that the defendant was chargeable with the condition of the carpet) it cannot be by anybody deliberately concluded that she used the proper care to avoid the danger so well known to her. The circumstance, itself, of her catching her foot was evidence of negligence on her part.

Koch v. Edgewater, 14 Hun, 544; Niven v. Rochester, 76 N. Y. 619; Lansigan v. New York Gas Light Co. 71 N. Y. 29.

The plaintiff went down these stairs very often. If so, the greater care was necessary, and it would have been easy for her to have avoided the danger of falling by just putting in a few tacks in the carpet, the labor of a few moments, which would at least temporarily remove the danger even if the defendant had contracted to keep this carpet in repair; she could have properly done this.

Myers v. Burns, 35 N. Y. 269.

But the defendant was not liable for the defect in the stairway, or chargeable with legal negligence to its tenants for its being out of repair.

1. He had not covenanted to keep the carpet in good condition.

O'Brien v. Capwell, 59 Barb. 497.

2. Even if there was an agreement to keep in repair in this respect, the halls, such agreements have reference to the pecuniary use and the benefit to be derived from their enjoyment. If the covenant is broken, the tenant may sue for his damage for loss of enjoyment or annul the lease, or make the repairs himself on notice and recover the amount, but cannot sue for injuries to persons in his family, who knew of the defects as well as himself, and yet continue the occupation of the rooms without repairing himself, or abandoning the premises.

Flynn v. Hatton, 43 How. Pr. 333; Walker v. Swayzee, 3 Abb. Pr. 136; Hexter v. Knox, 63 N. Y. 561; Myers v. Burns, supra.

3. In the absence of a contract the landlord is not liable to any extent for the want of repair in the premises.

McGlathan v. Tallmadge, 37 Barb. 313; Sherwood v. Seaman, 2 Bosw. 190; Howard v. Doolittle, 8 Duer, 464-473, and cases cited; Hart v. Windsor, 12 Mees. & W. 63; Doupe v. Genin, 45 N. Y. 119.

Bradley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, as tenant of the defendant, occupied some rooms in a tenement-house of the latter, and had access to such rooms by means of a stairway common to the occupants of the building. It appears by the evidence on her part that in descending the stairway in the evening of January 15, 1888, the plaintiff fell and received the injuries complained of and that such fall was caused by the defective condition of the stair carpet; that the carpet had been in such condition for several months; and that the attention of the defendant had in December previous been called to it by the plaintiff, and he said he would remove it. There was some conflict in the evidence of the parties as to the latter fact, and as to the subject of the injury and its cause; but that there were, and for considerable time had been, holes in the stairway carpet, was not seriously questioned. It was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care to keep this stairway in repair and suitable condition for the safe passage of his tenants over it in their way to and from their rooms, and for failure to do so he was chargeable with liability for injuries suffered by them without their fault while properly using it for such purpose. Looney v. McLean, form that duty will fasten the liability upon the landlord, under which the tenant by an appropriate action may recover. Dempsey v. Hertzfeld, 30 Ga. 866; Whittle v. Webster, 55 Ga. 180; Lowell v. Spaulding, 4 Cush. 277; Gridley v. Bloomington, 63 Ill. 47; Flynn v. Trask, 98 Mass. 550; Benson v. Suarez, 19 Abb. Pr. 61; Dowd v. Fitzpatrick, 18 N. Y. Week. Dig. 343; Donohue v. Kendall, 13 Jones & S. 336; Allegheeny v. Campbell, 107 Pa. 530.

Landlord's ignorance of defect, no excuse.

It has been decided in a recent case that it was not necessary to show that the landlord had actual knowledge of the defect complained of. His duty was that of due care; and ignorance of the defect was no defense. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477. See also Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 374; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 38; Watkins v. Goodall, 133 Mass. 533; Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 235.

Effect of notice.

After the landlord has been duly apprised of the defective condition of the demised premises, and a reasonable time has elapsed since the notice of such defect was imparted, he will become liable for any injury resulting from the dangerous condition aforesaid. Reichenbacher v. Pahmeyer, 3 Ill. App. 217; Coke v. Gutkese, 80 Ky. 523, 44 Am. Rep. 499; Cesar v. Karutz, 60 N. Y. 229; Minor v. Sharon, 113 Mass. 477, 17 Am. Rep. 123; Albert v. State, 6 Cent. Rep. 447, 66 Md. 323; Owings v. Jones, 9 Md. 103.

In the absence of fraud or deceit, there is no implied covenant that the demised premises are fit for occupation or for the particular use which the tenant intends to make of them. The maxim of caveat emptor applies. Cleves v. Willoughby, 1 Hill, 83; Post v. Vetter, 2 E. D. Smith, 243; Howard v. Doolittle, 8 Duer, 464; Robbins v. Mount, 4 Robt. 552; Flynn v. Hatton, 43 How. Pr. 333; Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 363; O'Brien v. Capwell, 59 Barb. 497; Dutton v. Gerrish, 9 Cush. 89; Foster v. Poyser, 9 Cush. 242; Royce v. Guggenheim, 103 Mass. 301; McAdam, Land. and Ten. § 242.

129 Mass. 53; Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 285; Donohue v. Kendall, 18 Jones & S. 886; Neyer v. Miller, 19 Jones & S. 516.

The conclusion was warranted by the evidence that the condition of the carpet was such as to justify apprehension of danger of tripping in passing upon the stairway, and that at the time in question the plaintiff's foot was caught in a hole in the carpet, thus causing her fall and injury; and that the defendant was chargeable with negligence for permitting it to remain in such condition, and with its consequences to the plaintiff, unless her negligence contributed to the injury which she sustained. It is urged that as she was cognizant of the situation, and the hall of the stairway was well lighted by a lamp, her fall was necessarily attributable to the fault or negligence of the plaintiff. Her previous knowledge of the condition of the passageway on the stairs imposed upon her the duty to exercise a greater degree of care than otherwise may have been required of her in passing over them, but she was not required to desist from using the stairway by reason of the ruptures in the carpet; and, while the question may have been a close one of fact, it could not properly be held as matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and therefore the motion for nonsuit was properly denied. Palmer v. Dearing, 93 N. Y. 7; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 88.

The question presented would have been quite different if the staircase had been part of the premises demised to the plaintiff. Then the evidence may not have warranted a recovery by her, and many of the cases cited by the defendant's counsel would have been applicable. But the stairway was not under the control of any of the tenants, but was provided by the defendant for the common use of those having occasion to pass to and from the rooms which they occupied as his tenants and the weight of the evidence bearing upon the question of negligence of the defendant, or of contributory negligence of the plaintiff, is not here for consideration. The appeal to the general term having been taken only from the judgment entered on the verdict, presented there for review questions of law only, dependent upon exceptions. To review in general term questions of fact arising upon a trial of an action at law by jury, it is essential that a motion be made for a new trial, at circuit, on the minutes, or at special term on a case, and that an appeal be taken from the order thereupon made as well as from the judgment, if one has been unqualifiedly entered upon the result of the trial. Wright v. Hunter, 46 N. Y. 409. And in such case an order reversing that denying a new trial, and granting it, is not reviewable in this court. Harris v. Burdett, 78 N. Y. 136.

There was no error in the reception of the evidence of the condition of the stair carpet the morning following the injury, as without proof to the contrary it was reasonable to assume that its then condition was substantially the same as at the time in question.

The order should be reversed, and the judgment entered on the verdict affirmed.

All concur.

Cornelius W. CARNWRIGHT, Recept.,
v.

Morgan GRAY et al., Exrs., etc., of Samuel
P. Freleigh, Deceased, Appts.

1. A promissory note, although non-negotiable, need not express any consideration, nor need evidence of consideration be given in the first instance in a suit to recover on it.
2. A note payable "thirty days after death" may be a valid instrument.

(Follett, Ch. J., and Vann. J., dissent.)

(June 2, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Ulster Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

The action was brought to recover upon a written instrument, of which the following is a copy:

"Quarryville, September 2, 1871.

"Thirty days after death I promise to pay to Cornelius Carnwright fifteen hundred dollars, with interest.

"Samuel P. Freleigh."

The plaintiff gave no evidence of the trans-

NOTE.—Commercial paper, consideration.

In an action upon a promissory note, whether negotiable or not, the plaintiff sustains the burden of proof by producing the note and proving its execution. It is evidence, under the hand of the promisor of a contract made upon a good consideration, even if the words "value received" are omitted. Townsend v. Derby, 3 Met. 383; Burnham v. Allen, 1 Gray, 496; Dean v. Carruth, 108 Mass. 242.

Although it was once held to be necessary to have in the body of the instrument an express acknowledgment of consideration, in order to raise the presumption of consideration (Cramlington v. Evans, 1 Show. 5), it is now generally held, in England (Poplewell v. Wilson, 1 Strange, 264; Claxton v. Swift, 2 Show. 496; Grant v. DaCosta, 3 Maule & S. 351; Mackleod v. Kneec, 2 Ld. Raym. 1451), and in the United States, to be unnecessary. Mandeville v. Welch, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 277, 5 L. ed. 57; Kendall v. Galvin, 15 Me. 131; Townsend v. Derby, 3 Met. 383; Dean v. Carruth, 108 Mass. 242; Goshen & M. Turnp. Co. v. Hurdin, 9 Johns. 217; Hughes v. Wheeler, 3 Cow. 83; Underhill v. Phillips, 10 Hun. 591; Kinsman v. Birdall, 3 E. D. Smith, 395; Peasley v. Boatwright, 3 Leigh, 196; Hubble v. Fogardie, 3 Rich. L. 413; Hunley v. Lang, 5 Port. (Ala.) 154; Murry v. Clayborn, 3 Bibb, 300; Matlock v. Livingston, 9 Smedes & M. 496; People v. McDermott, 3 Cal. 233. See Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 153.

An absolute indorsement of a bill of exchange or promissory note imports a valid consideration passing from the indorsee to the indorser; but in order that this quality should attend the instrument it should be for the payment of money only, absolutely and at all events. 3 Kent, Com. 74; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 2; Chitty, Bills, 153, 154, 157, 213, 219;

action out of which the instrument arose, and none of the actual consideration thereof, but, having offered testimony tending to prove the genuineness of the maker's signature, put the note in evidence, and rested his case.

Messrs. Peter Cantine and John J. Linsom, for appellants:

A negotiable promissory note, expressing value received, is prima facie evidence of a consideration.

Edwards, Bills and Prom. Notes, pp. 78, 811; Dan. Neg. Inst. 163; 1 Parsons, Bills and Notes, p. 127.

If the note is not strictly speaking a promissory note, such as one payable in chattels, a consideration must be alleged and proved.

Spear v. Downing, 84 Barb. 522.

Where a note contains the words "value received" and the complaint alleges a particular consideration, that consideration must be proved.

Jerome v. Whitney, 7 Johns. 321; Saxton v. Johnson, 10 Johns. 418; Walrad v. Petrie, 4 Wend. 575.

A non-negotiable note, without the words

"value received," or other equivalent words, is not evidence from which a consideration can be implied.

Edgerton v. Edgerton, 8 Conn. 6; Bristol v. Warner, 19 Conn. 7; Courtney v. Doyle, 10 Allen. 129; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 163, 1 Parsons, Bills and Notes, p. 127.

While cases can be found in this State, where the courts have suggested in their opinions that non-negotiable promissory notes, without words expressing value received, import a consideration, yet on examination, they show that either the plaintiff did affirmatively prove a consideration on the trial or that the words expressing a consideration appeared in the body of the note.

See Saxton v. Johnson, supra; Kimball v. Huntington, 10 Wend. 675; Goshen & M. Turnp. Co. v. Hurin, 9 Johns. 217; Cruger v. Armstrong, 8 Johns. Cas. 5; Conroy v. Warren, 8 Johns. Cas. 259; Roubitschek v. Blank, 80 N. Y. 479; Kinsman v. Birdsall, 3 E. D. Smith, 395; Dean v. Carruth, 108 Mass. 242; Richards v. Barlow, 1 New Eng. Rep. 577, 140 Mass. 218; Paine v. Noels, 53 How. Pr. 273.

The burden of proving a consideration re-

Story, Prom. Notes, § 128; Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend. 221; Overton v. Tyler, 3 Pa. 346.

But this rule ceases to operate in case of a restrictive indorsement. The paper is no longer negotiable, imports no consideration from an indorser, nor does it by implication disclose a promise to pay. Dan. Neg. Inst. 515; Edwards, Bills and Notes, §§ 111, 112; Bayley, Bills and Notes, 107; Chitty, Bills, 253, 259; 3 Kent, Com. 92; Power v. Finnie, 4 Call, 411; Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass. 543; Sigourney v. Lloyd, 8 Barn. & C. 622; Treuttl v. Barandon, 8 Taunt. 100; Anchor v. Bank of England, Dougl. 637; Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. I. 119; Edie v. East India Co. 2 Burr. 1216, 1227; Holliday v. Atkinson, 5 Barn. & C. 501; Sweeney v. Easter, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 166, 17 L. ed. 681; Averett v. Booker, 15 Gratt. 163; Brown v. Jackson, 1 Wash. C. C. 512; Snee v. Prescott, 1 Atk. 247.

A bill negotiable on its face implies a valid consideration, and hence it is not necessary for the holder to allege and prove its presence. Smith v. Gardner, 4 Bosw. 54; Bayley, Bills and Notes, 67; Bank of Orleans v. Barry, 1 Dento, 118; Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns. 239; Central Bank of Brooklyn v. Lank, 1 Bosw. 202; Jerome v. Whitney, 7 Johns. 321; Bigelow v. Colton, 13 Gray, 300; Lines v. Smith, 4 Fla. 47; Plets v. Johnson, 3 Hill, 113; United States v. White, 2 Hill, 59; Edwards, Bills and Notes, 165, 166; Bank of Troy v. Topping, 13 Wend. 557; 1 Parsons, Bills, 237; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 161.

Restrictive indorsement.

The restrictive indorsements which are held to negative the presumption of a consideration are such as indicate that they are not intended to pass the title, but merely to enable the indorsee to collect for the benefit of the indorser, such as indorsements "for collection" or others showing that the indorser is entitled to the proceeds. These create merely an agency, and negative the presumption of the transfer of the bill and the indorsee for a valuable consideration. Hook v. Pratt, 78 N. Y. 371.

Where the indorsement purports to pass the title to the bill therein from the indorser, and devert him of all beneficial interest, a consideration for such transfer is presumed. The citation from 3 Kent, Com. 92, states the principle to be that when the indorsement is a mere authority to receive the money for the use or according to the directions of the indorser, it is evidence that the indorsee did not give a valuable consideration for it and is not the absolute owner. This accords with the statement of the principle by Wilmot, J., in Edie v. East India Co. 2 Burr. 1227. See also Hook v. Pratt, supra.

Effect of a condition as to payment.

If the instrument is made payable out of a particular fund, or hinges upon some condition, or in something besides money, it loses its character as a bill of exchange, and no longer imports a consideration. In an action upon such a note, consideration must be alleged and proved, unless it be stated in the body of the instrument that it was given for value received. Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 691; De Forrest v. Frary, 6 Cow. 151; Bilderback v. Burlingame, 27 Ill. 311.

The effect of the phrase "for value received."

The words "for value received," so frequently incorporated with the body of a negotiable instrument, are no longer considered necessary to denote the presence of a consideration. Benjamin v. Tillman, 2 McLean, 213; People v. McDermott, 8 Cal. 238; Holliday v. Atkinson, 5 Barn. & C. 503; Grant v. Da Costa, 3 Maule & S. 351; Townsend v. Derby, 3 Met. 363; Hatch v. Trayer, 11 Ad. & El. 703; Hubble v. Fogarty, 3 Rich. L. 413; Kendall v. Galvin, 15 Me. 181; Hughes v. Wheeler, 8 Cow. 77; Clayton v. Gosling, 5 Barn. & C. 300; Mackled v. Snee, 3 Ld. Raym. 1481; Arnold v. Sprague, 34 Vt. 403; Poplewell v. Wilson, 1 Strange, 264; White v. Ledwick, 4 Dougl. 247; Jones v. Jones, 6 Mea. & W. 84; Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 51-53.

It remains to add that by statutory enactment in some of the States, notably, Arkansas (Rev. Stat. 1874, §§ 568, 569), Missouri (Rev. Stat. 1879, § 545), and Pennsylvania (Purdon, Dig. (1872) p. 1173, § 1), it is required that all promissory notes must contain the words "for value received," in order to make them negotiable; but the note or bill does not necessarily presume a consideration existing prior to its execution—it does import consideration, that is at least contemporaneous. Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 533. See Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 153.

As between the original parties, the consideration of a note is open to inquiry. Wilson v. Ellsworth, 26 Neb. 246. See note to Kulenkamp v. Groß (Mich.) 1 L. R. A. 594.

mains upon the plaintiff notwithstanding the presumption, and if there is any evidence in the case on this point on behalf of the defendant, the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the whole evidence that the note was given for a valuable consideration.

Perley v. Perley, 8 New Eng. Rep. 737, 144 Mass. 104; Powers v. Russell, 18 Pick. 69; DeLano v. Bartlett, 6 Cush. 364; Simpson v. Davis, 119 Mass. 269; 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 164; Brynn v. Russell, 52 Hun, 17.

The presumption of consideration and delivery can be overcome by proving facts and circumstances which overcome the presumption.

Anthony v. Harrison, 14 Hun, 218, affirmed in 74 N. Y. 618; Sawyer v. Warner, 15 Barb. 282; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 79-81, and note; Dryer v. Brown, 52 Hun, 321.

Messa F. L. Westbrook and J. N. Fiero, for respondent:

A non-negotiable note need not express on its face a consideration.

Kimball v. Huntington, 10 Wend. 676; Goshen & M. Turnp. Co. v. Hurlin, 9 Johns. 217; Paine v. Noelke, 54 How. Pr. 335; Townsend v. Derby, 8 Met. 364; Underhill v. Phillips, 10 Hun, 592; Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y. 146; Luquer v. Prosser, 1 Hill, 258.

Promissory notes partake in a very high degree of the character of specialties and are deemed, prima facie, to be founded upon a valuable consideration, and may be generally declared on without specially stating what the particular consideration is; in which circumstance they differ from other unsealed contracts whether written or unwritten.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When the plaintiff rested his case, and again at the close of the testimony, the defendants moved to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that no proof had been given that the instrument sued upon had any consideration. These motions were denied, and the court instructed the jury that the instrument was a promissory note, and imported a consideration and that the burden rested upon the defendants to show that it was without a consideration. The exceptions to these rulings present the principal question argued upon this appeal. The Statute of this State in reference to promissory notes provides as follows (1 Rev. Stat. 768): "Section 1. All notes in writing, made and signed by any person, whereby he shall promise to pay to any other person, or his order, or to the order of any other person, or unto the bearer, any sum of money therein mentioned, shall be due and payable as therein expressed; and shall have the same effect, and be negotiable in like manner, as inland bills of exchange, according to the custom of merchants." "Sec. 4. The payees and indorsees of every such note payable to them or their order, and the holders of every such note payable to bearer, may maintain actions for the sums of money therein mentioned against the makers and indorsers of the same, respectively, in like manner as in cases of inland bills of exchange, and not otherwise."

Our Statute is a substantial re-enactment of the Statute of Anne (8 & 4 Anne, chap. 9), which provided that "all notes signed by a person promising to pay to another, his, her or their order, or to bearer," should be construed to be by virtue thereof due and payable to any such person to whom the same is made payable, etc. This statute was held by the courts of England to include within its terms a non-negotiable note. Smith v. Kendall, 6 T. R. 123; Burchell v. Slocock, 2 Ld. Raym. 1545; 8 Kent, Com. 77. In the case first cited Lord Kenyon said: "A note may be made payable to A. or bearer, A. or order, or to A. only." Similar decisions were made by the courts of this State under our own Statute. Downing v. Backenstoos, 8 Cal. 187; Goshen & M. Turnp. Co. v. Hurlin, 9 Johns. 217; Kimball v. Huntington, 10 Wend. 675; Hall v. Farmer, 5 Denio, 484. In Downing v. Backenstoos a non-negotiable note was declared on as within the Statute, and the defendant demurred on the ground that the declaration did not allege the transaction and consideration upon which the note was given. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, saying: "The very point was settled in Green v. Long, April Term, 1798, in conformity to the adjudications in Westminster Hall." In Goshen & M. Turnp. Co. v. Hurlin it was said: "The note set forth is a good promissory note within the Statute, though it has no words 'bearer or order.' This is the established English law, and the same rule is recognized by this court."

In Kimball v. Huntington the action was upon a due-bill in this form: "Due Kimball & Kenston three hundred and twenty-five dollars, payable on demand." Judge Nelson said: "The instrument is a promissory note within the Statute. Neither the acknowledgment of value received nor negotiable words are essential to bring it within the Statute." See also Carver v. Hayes, 47 Me. 257; Franklin v. March, 6 N. H. 364.

No authority is cited in the courts of this State or of England holding that a non-negotiable note is not within the terms of the laws cited, and we are of the opinion that the language of our Statute includes a note payable to a person without words of negotiability. The instrument sued upon being, therefore, a promissory note within the Statute of this State, it follows that it imports a consideration. By the express terms of the Statute the sum of money therein mentioned is declared to be "due and payable, as therein expressed." That it is "due and payable" according to its terms is the legal conclusion which the court must draw from the instrument itself. A valid contract is thus declared to exist, and of course a consideration must be implied. Hence "value received" need not appear on the face of the note, as those words express only what the law implies. Hatch v. Traves, 11 Ad. & El. 702; Hall v. Farmer, 5 Denio, 484. The effect of laws which make promissory notes negotiable, or which authorize actions of debt upon them, though non-negotiable, is to take them out of the common-law rule which requires that every contract must be shown by the party who sues upon it to be supported by a consideration, and enables the holder to maintain an action thereon without alleging or proving a consideration. In other words, a consideration is implied from the character of the instrument. Peasley v. Boatwright, 2 Leigh, 195; Hatch v. Traves, supra. The English Statute was enacted to settle the controversy that prevailed, whether, under the customs of merchants, promissory notes were negotiable. They were thereby declared to be assignable or indorsable over in the same manner as inland bills of exchange were according to the customs of merchants, and holders were empowered to maintain actions thereon in the same manner as they might do upon any inland bill of exchange made or drawn according to the custom of merchants. Our Statute contains similar provisions. Promissory notes and inland bills of exchange were by virtue of these laws put upon an equality. They were made negotiable if they contained words of negotiability; but, whether negotiable or not, and whether they expressed value received or not, it was no longer necessary in actions thereon to aver and prove consideration. Such was and is the rule as to inland bills of exchange. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 161; Raubitschek v. Blank, 80 N. Y. 479; Averett v. Booker, 15 Gratt. 168; Wells v. Brigham, 6 Cush. 6. And the same rule under the Statute was made applicable to promissory notes. Townsend v. Derby, 3 Met. 368; Dean v. Carruth, 108 Mass. 242; Bank of Troy v. Topping, 9 Wend. 277, and 18 Wend. 557; Chitty, Bills, 9th Am. ed. 78-181; Paine v. Noeike, 58 How. Pr. 273; Story, Prom. Notes, § 51; 8 Kent, Com. 77, 78; 1 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. 249; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills, p. 193.

The Statute does not require a note to express value received upon its face, and no definition of such an instrument requires the expression of that fact. The note sued upon, although by its terms payable after the death of the maker, was a valid instrument. A promissory note is defined to be a written engagement by one person to pay absolutely and unconditionally to another person therein named, or to the bearer, a certain sum of money at a specified time or on demand. Story, Prom. Notes, § 1; Coolidge v. Ruggles, 15 Mass. 387. It must contain the positive engagement of the maker to pay at a certain definite time, and the agreement to pay must not depend on any contingency, but be absolute, and at all events. Tried by this standard, the instrument set out in the complaint was a valid promissory note. The fact that it was payable after the death of the maker did not affect its character. 8 Kent, Com. 76. It follows from these views that the motion to dismiss the complaint was properly denied, and there was no error in the charge of the court.

The point made by the appellants that the court erred in its charge as to the burden of proof on the question of consideration, assuming that evidence pro and con upon that question was given, was not raised at the trial. The proposition made by the defendants at the close of the judge's charge, and the only one to which an exception appears in the record, was as follows: "In order that there may be no doubt about our position, we ask the court to charge the jury that there has been no evidence given of consideration, and to direct a verdict for the defendants upon that ground." The defendants, having thus squarely planted themselves on the ground that there was no evidence of consideration, and asked the court to direct a verdict in their favor, cannot now claim that there was evidence for the jury, and that they were entitled to a different instruction from that given. The defendants' claim all through the trial was that the note did not import a consideration, and that the plaintiff could not recover without proof of that fact; and his motion to dismiss the complaint and to direct a verdict in his favor, and his exceptions to the charge, all sharply present that question, but he nowhere claimed that he had given evidence which, if believed by the jury, overcame the presumption arising in favor of the note. This clearly appears from the statement I have quoted.

The exceptions to the admission of evidence present no error, and the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur, except Follett, Ch. J., and Vann, J., dissenting, and Parker, J., not voting.

Title to the hay, oats and straw, is not reserved to the owner of a farm as against attaching creditors of a tenant, under a lease by which the tenant agrees to raise enough stuff to feed the stock of the place, or, if he fails to do so, buy what may be necessary.

NOTE.—Rights of the landlord as against attaching creditors of the tenant.

The stipulation not to remove the produce—hay, oats and straw—is in the nature of a covenant upon which, if broken, the lessors may base an action for damages, but which does not affect the lessee's title to the production of the farm. Smith v. Putnam, 3 Pick. 221; Walker v. Fitts, 24 Pick. 191.

The principle established by the case under review is vindicated by a decision of the New York supreme court, holding that where the lease containing a security clause for the rent reserved had not been filed as a chattel mortgage when the levies were made, such lease became invalid and nugatory as against the parties plaintiff in an attachment suit who had by superior diligence secured a judgment and perfected a levy before the landlord had filed his lease. Stewart v. Beale, 7 Hun, 405, affirmed, 68 N. Y. 623.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Orange County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain farm produce which defendant had seized under executions against a third person. Reversed.

Statement by Follett. Ch. J.:

Appeal from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court of the Second Judicial Department, affirming a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury. This action (replevin) was begun October 18, 1886, to recover a quantity of hay, oats and straw grown in that year by a tenant on a farm owned by the plaintiff, which, in April, 1884, was leased, with stock in which the landlord and tenant were jointly interested, for an annual rent of $960, payable in monthly installments of $80 each. The tenant, Patrick Kane, occupied the farm until the 1st of October, 1886, when he left, indebted to the plaintiff for $100 rent, and to various persons. On the 5th, 6th and 14th of that month the defendant, a constable, seized a part of the hay, oats and straw grown on the farm, by virtue of six warrants of attachment issued by a justice of the peace. The property was taken by the sheriff under the process issued in this action, and was subsequently delivered to the plaintiff. From April, 1880, to April, 1884, Kane worked the farm on shares, he having one third and the plaintiff two thirds of its products; but in April, 1884, the farm, the stock owned by the landlord, as well as that in which both were interested, was let as above stated. On the trial the value of the property was assessed at $1,000, and the title was found to be in the plaintiff.

Assuming that this arrangement gave the title to this property to Colville, it is perfectly apparent that Kane's interest in it was a leviable

It is a well-authenticated general rule that if a lease contains no reservations, the tenant is entitled to remove all the crops harvested during his term. Wiley v. Conner, 44 Vt. 68; Clark v. Harvey, 54 Pa. 142.

In case of crops to be sown, it vests potentially from the time of the bargain, actually as soon as the suit arises. Andrew v. Newcomb, 32 N. Y. 417.

Where a tenant sold crops covered by a mortgage clause in a lease to a vendee who had full notice of such clause, the crops went into his hands impressed with the lien thereof; and when he sold them, he took the proceeds in trust for the purchaser of said premises at the sheriff's sale, and became liable to him for the amount. Butt v. Ellett, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 544, 23 L. ed. 183.

When a state statute confers upon the landlord a lien upon the crops upon the demised premises in any year for the rent of that year, but gives no specific lien upon other property of the tenant, prior to the levy of a distress warrant by the landlord, he has no lien on property of the tenant on the premises except the crops. Morgan v. Campbell, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 331, 23 L. ed. 798.

Where the lessee of a tenant for life has growing crops unharvested at the time of the latter's death, he is entitled to them. Bradley v. Bailey, 1 L. R. A. 437, 56 Conn. 374, 7 Am. St. Rep. 316.

A landlord can make a valid agreement with a tenant that the title to the crop raised by the latter on the landlord's premises shall remain in the landlord until he has been paid his rent and advances. De Vaughn v. Howell, 82 Ga. 336; Pelton v. Draper, 61 Vt. 364.

The lessee of a farm for one half the crops as rent owns the other half free from the landlord's debts. Stickney v. Stickney, 77 Iowa, 699.

New York Code, § 1754, vests the possession of the crop in the landlord only in order to secure a compliance with the terms of the lease; as against all other persons the title is in the tenant or his assignees. Keeler v. Cornelison, 98 N. C. 333; Bridgers v. Dill, 97 N. C. 222.

In certain cases of leases, covenants that the lessor shall have all the grain to be grown upon the lands rented as security for unpaid rent have been held good. Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Van Hoozer v. Cory, 34 Barb. 9; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 66 N. Y. 459, and cases cited. See Cressey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120.

Where lease of farm provides that half of the hay raised on it shall be consumed thereon by cattle kept by the lessee, and the other half be divided between the lessor and lessee, the property in the whole of the hay remains in the lessee until the division is made. The lessor has no claim in rem upon it before division. When the division is made under the contract, the portion divided vests separately in the lessor and lessee, but the other undivided half to be consumed on the farm still remains the property of the lessee. Symonds v. Hall, 87 Me. 354, 59 Am. Dec. 58.

It has been held, and is stated in Waples on Attachment, p. 498, that one who has a lien on goods for money advanced must have it recorded or must give notice to an attaching creditor if he would maintain his lien as superior to that of such creditor. Quinn v. Halbert, 55 Vt. 224.

If the attacher knows of the existence of the lien for advances, or that of a vendor for purchase money, it is immaterial from what source his knowledge is obtained; he is bound to respect it. McPhail v. Gerry, 55 Vt. 174.

Any notice of such pre-existing liens answers the purpose of recording, so far as the attacher is concerned. Kelsey v. Kendall, 43 Vt. 27; Allen v. McCalla, 25 Iowa, 464; McGavran v. Haupt, 9 Iowa, 83; Boyd v. Beck, 29 Ala. 703; De Vandal v. Malone, 25 Ala. 272; Dearing v. Watkins, 16 Ala. 20; Smith v. Zurcher, 9 Ala. 308; Magee v. Carpenter, 4 Ala. 469.

The burden is on the prior lienholder to show notice (Whitcomb v. Woodworth, 54 Vt. 544), and it has been thought that he must show that the notice emanated from himself (Stearns v. Wrisley, 30 Vt. 661; Farmers & M. Bank v. Drury, 35 Vt. 469); but if the attacher knew of that fact it ought to matter whence his information came. See Waples, Attachm. p. 499.

one. For Kane's interest was not only a possessory right, but he had the right to absolutely dispose of it, and use it, to consume it and convert it into milk there upon this farm, and with this dairy of cows. This was a leviable interest, and was properly attached by Kane's creditors.

Van Antwerp v. Newman, 3 Cow. 548, approved in 23 N. Y. 282; Putnam v. Wyley, 8 Johns. 482; Hull v. Carnley, 11 N. Y. 501, 17 N. Y. 202; Edw. Bailm. § 368; Reinmiller v. Skidmore, 7 Lans. 161.

Mr. John Vincent, for respondent:

Kane could not, during the pendency of the lease, sell or carry away the crops, nor give any title to them. He had, then, no right of property in them, and no leviable interest, even while on the farm as tenant. If he had none while on the farm, he certainly had none after he left it.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frequently the title to the products of lands leased for agricultural purposes is reserved by the lessor, or a lien is created as security for the payment of rent; but no such claim is put forward in this case. It is not asserted that the landlord and tenant owned the products jointly, and title was in the one or the other in severalty. This action was brought and maintained on the theory that the plaintiff held the legal title to the property in question. The only witness who gave evidence in support of the action was the plaintiff, who testified: "As near as I can recollect, he (Kane) was to take charge of the stock. He was to raise enough stuff on the place to feed the stock; and, if there was not enough to carry them through the year, he was to buy what was necessary to carry it out, which he has not been doing for the last two years. The stuff was not to be sold. There was forty odd head of cattle. You do not raise stuff to sell when you have cattle. . . . The hay and grain were not to be removed; it was not raised to sell; it belonged to the cattle. Q. Did you have any interest in the farm after you made the lease to Mr. Kane, or the products of it in any way? A. No; I gave that up with the lease of the cows. I leased the cows, and leased everything. I gave him all that the ground produced. I never received any of the products for the sale of young stock or produce sold from said farm. I never gave any direction about working the farm, or made any inquiry of Kane as to what he was using on the farm, or what he sold off the farm. I did not care so long as he raised the milk. I told him he could use anything he wanted except the stock. I was entitled to two thirds of the stock when it was sold. He sold it all and pocketed it; and I never got my two thirds. . . . He put on seven cows. He kept sheep on the farm. I do not know what he did with them. . . . When the farm was leased the hay and grain was not mentioned at all. He was to raise enough stuff on the farm to keep the cattle. If there was not enough raised on the place he was to buy what was requisite. What was raised on the place was to be fed to the cattle. . . . There was no conversation particularly in which anything was said about feeding the cattle from the products raised on the farm. He was to raise the stuff and support the cattle. If the place did not support the cattle he was to buy whatever was necessary. That was the agreement. I cannot state what he said. I am stating what I said. I said it, and he agreed to it."

This is all the testimony given in behalf of the plaintiff, which tends to show that he reserved the title to the products of the farm. The tenant, and a witness who heard the bargain, testified that it was not agreed that the crops were to be fed on the place, and that no reservation was made in respect to them. The court instructed the jury, in effect, that if the plaintiff's evidence was true the title to the property was in him, and that he was entitled to recover; to which the defendant excepted. The court was also asked to dismiss the complaint, upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to establish title, which was refused, and an exception taken. In this, we think, the court erred. If the plaintiff had the title to this property, it might have been taken in execution for his debts, or he could have sold it to a purchaser in good faith and for value, to the exclusion of the tenant and all claiming under him. Such consequences do not flow from the contract testified to by the plaintiff. He did not testify that title to the hay and grain was reserved by him, but that the tenant agreed to feed enough of it on the farm to support the stock. This did not amount to a reservation of title, but was an executory contract, for a violation of which the landlord could have recovered damages.

The question involved in this case has been several times considered by the Supreme Court of this State. In Johnson v. Crofoot, 53 Barb. 574, 87 How. Pr. 59, a farm was let by a written lease for an annual money rent. The lease contained a stipulation that the tenant "should feed out the hay and straw in a careful and farmer-like manner;" and it was further agreed that if sufficient hay and straw were not raised to keep the stock the landlord was to supply the deficiency. It was also provided: "The parties of the first part [landlords] are to have full title, with the privilege of taking possession, at any and all times, of any and all products of the farm in payment of the balance due on the rent." A judgment was recovered against the tenant during the existence of the lease, and an execution issued to the defendant, who levied upon and sold about sixty tons of hay raised on the farm by the tenant, and then being in his actual possession on the farm. The plaintiff brought trover, claiming that under the lease the title to the hay never passed to or vested in the tenant, but that it was to remain on the farm for the purpose of feeding the stock. Verdict was directed for the defendant at the circuit, which direction was sustained at general term, the court saying: "But it is argued by the counsel for the plaintiff that it [lease] was not a mortgage, and that the title to such hay as should grow on the place did not pass to Tift [the tenant] because he stipulated in the lease that he would cut and get in in good order all the hay, and that he would feed out the hay and straw in a saving manner; and because it was further stipulated that he was to have the privilege of keeping a span of horses all the time, and a third horse during haying, which, it is claimed, is inconsistent with the idea that the title to the hay was to be in him." In answer to this contention the court said: "The covenant on the part of Tift was to save all the hay and straw, and to carefully feed it to the stock; and to keep but two horses except during haying time was only an agreement binding on him at law, and if he chose to keep more horses, or to sell and improvidently use the hay, it did not authorize Miller and Rumble, the lessors, to interfere with him, either by taking possession of it (for they were entitled to possession only as security for the unpaid rent), or to restrain such use of it by injunction."

In McCombs v. Becker, 8 Hun, 842, 5 Thomp. & C. 550, the defendant leased his farm and forty cows for a money rent. It was stipulated that the tenant should take good care of the cows, and, in case the hay raised on the farm should be insufficient to winter them, the landlord should supply the deficiency at the rate of $3 per ton, and if there should be a surplus, the landlord should have it, and pay the tenant $3 per ton for it. A judgment was recovered against the tenant, and an execution issued under which part of the hay was purchased by the plaintiff, and afterwards the defendant (the landlord) converted it to his own use. In an action brought for the conversion it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the court saying: "True, the landlord was to have the surplus hay, and pay $3 per ton for it, but this was an executory contract for its purchase, the breach of which would be compensated in damages. It follows that the hay was the tenant's, and subject to sale upon execution against him."

Hawkins v. Giles, 45 Hun, 818, arose over a lease of a farm and seven cows from April 1, 1883, to April 1, 1884, for $175 rent. The lessee agreed "to feed out all the fodder on said farm that is raised on said farm, . . . and winter said stock—seven cows—through to grass in the spring of 1884 on hay." In December, 1883, an execution creditor of the lessee levied upon about 25 tons of hay grown upon the farm during that year which was sold to the plaintiff in the action. The owner of the farm prevented him from taking the hay claiming (1) that the tenant left without fully paying the rent; (2) that the hay was required to keep the cows through to grass of 1884; (3) that he was entitled to the manure which would be made by the hay being fed on the farm. It was held that the title to the hay was in the tenant, and was subject to sale under the execution, and the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed. Steffin v. Steffin, 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 179, 17 N. Y. W. Dig. 418, arose over an agreement to cultivate a farm on shares, the occupant agreeing to deliver "one half of all the products of said farm to [the owner] Mary A. Lockwood." An execution was issued against the occupant, and levied upon grain grown on the farm. It was held that the title to the property was in the occupant, the owner having a lien.

In Turner v. Bachelder, 17 Me. 257, a farm, with tools, four cows, and other stock, was leased for a term of years, the landlord to have "one half of all the corn and grain and potatoes that shall grow on the farm, and half of the calves, and half of the lambs, and half of the wool. There was a clause in the lease that the lessor was to furnish four cows, one horse and other stock sufficient to eat up all the hay that should grow on said farm." The hay was levied upon and sold by a creditor of the lessee, who was held to have a leviable interest in it, and that the lessor had no title to it.

In Symonds v. Hall, 87 Me. 354, a farm was worked upon shares. By one of the terms of the agreement "one half of the hay cut on the farm is to be eat by the stock kept on the farm, and the other half of the hay is to be divided equally between the contracting parties." An execution creditor of the occupier seized and sold the hay. The owner of the land brought trover. It was held that the title to the hay before division was in the occupier, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the undivided hay sold under the execution.

In Orcutt v. Moore, 184 Mass. 48, the principle decided in the three cases last cited was held to be the law in Massachusetts. The case at bar was decided upon the authority of Heald v. Builders Mut. F. Ins. Co., 111 Mass. 88, in which it was held that a clause in a lease similar in effect to the agreement testified to by the plaintiff amounted to a reservation of the title to the owner of the land. This case seems to be in conflict with the cases decided by the Supreme Court of this State; and, believing the rule declared by our courts rests upon well-recognized principles, we must decline to follow the Supreme Court of Massachusetts and overrule the judgments of our own courts.

The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

NOTE.—Exemption from taxes generally does not exempt church property from special assessment.

The fact that property is occupied for purposes of religious worship will not exempt it from assessment for street improvements. Re New York, 11 Johns. 80; Northern Liberties v. St. Johns Church, 13 Pa. 104; Second Universalist Soc. v. Providence, 6 R. I. 238; Lefevre v. Detroit, 2 Mich. 587; Trustees of M. E. Church v. Ellis, 38 Ind. 3; Ramesch v. United Brethren Christ Church, 4 West. Rep. 730, 107 Ind. 1; Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 8 Bush, 508.

A charter of a religious corporation, providing that its property shall be "exempt from all taxation and assessments, special or general, for any and all purposes whatever," does not exempt it from paying for the opening of a street in proportion to the benefit or advantage derived from it. Such local assessment is not within the meaning of the word "tax." Chicago v. Baptist Theological Union, 3 West. Rep. 93, 115 Ill. 245.

The exemption of a corporation, in its charter, "from all taxation of every kind," does not exempt it from the special taxation of contiguous and abutting on Marietta Street. The sf. fa. was issued for the pro rata share of these premises of the cost incurred in the year 1883 by the City in paving with Belgian blocks the roadway or street proper on which the premises abutted. The payment was made under protest, and to prevent a sale of the property in pursuance of the levy. The street was paved by virtue of the Act of September 8, 1881, amending the charter of the City, and the provisions of the Act were fully complied with. The church building was used only for church purposes and religious worship. At the trial the facts were agreed upon, and reduced to writing, and, by consent of parties, the only question raised was stated thus: "Is property occupied by a church, and used for church purposes only, and religious worship, liable for street improvement under the said Act of 1881?" The court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff; and after verdict the defendant moved for a new trial because of error in this instruction, and because the verdict was contrary to law and to evidence. The motion was overruled.

The Act in question (Acts 1880-81, p. 358) was construed by a majority of this court as then constituted, in Trustees of First M. E. Church v. Atlanta, 76 Ga. 181; and that decision was afterwards held by a full bench to be conclusive upon the parties in that case, the same case having again come up for review. The principle of res adjudicata made the latter ruling a necessary corollary to the former, whether the first in order was correct or incorrect. But as the present case, although it involves the same question touching the right construction of the Act of 1881, is a new case, and between different parties, or with one of the parties different, the duty of construing the Act de novo cannot be declined by the present bench, save upon the ground that the former construction is satisfactory, or, if not, that it should be acquiesced in because of some mischief or public inconvenience likely to result from adopting and promulgating a different construction property for local improvements. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Decatur, 1 L. R. A. 613, 126 Ill. 92.

An Act providing that lands belonging to incorporated cemetery associations should be exempt from taxes, rates, assessments, etc., does not extend to municipal assessments levied to defray the expenses of local improvements. Buffalo Cemetery Assn. v. Buffalo, 43 Hun, 137.

A tax for street improvements is not against the person, but against the property. Hawthorne v. East Portland, 13 Or. 371.

after the first has stood undisturbed for a period of nearly five years. The rule of stare decisis is a wholesome one, but should not be used to sanctify and perpetuate error in so short a term as five years, without very weighty reasons in behalf of public policy.

At the last term of this court, we recognized the rule in Scott v. Steward, 48 Ga. 772, as a right rule of decision where many transactions of the public at large, based on an exposition of the law declared ten or eleven years ago, would probably be disturbed or vitiated by expounding the law differently now. We deprecate and distrust rash innovation as much as the most conservative magistrates ought; but it has never been the doctrine of any court of last resort that the law is to be a refuge and safe asylum for all the errors that creep into it. Indeed, the mind, private or official, which closes down upon all the errors it embraces, refusing to effect them when exposed, is no longer fit for the pursuit of truth. Courts, like individuals, but with more caution and deliberation, must sometimes reconsider what has been already carefully considered, and rectify their own mistakes. If this is to be done in any case, it would seem to be a case like the present, where a change of decision would uproot no transaction founded on the prior decision, and where the effect in the particular controversy at the bar would be simply to leave the parties where they had placed themselves by doing aright what one of them now seeks to have undone. If, in very truth, according to the real law of the matter, the church corporation paid to the City a debt which it justly owed, and for which it was legally liable, it could not recover back the money consistently with Christian morality, were there no other obstacle to withdrawing the cash from the city treasury. Nor does the corporation desire so to do, for it has united with the city in formulating thus the question to be decided: "Is property occupied by a church, and used for church purposes only and religious worship, liable for street improvement under the said Act of 1881?" We could not answer truly according to our judicial convictions by citing and following the case in 76 Ga., for we think that case misconstrues the Act, and unduly restricts its application.

The Act, after conferring power to grade, pave, macadamize and otherwise improve the streets, invests the mayor and general council with "power and authority to assess one third of the cost of grading, paving, macadamizing, . . . and otherwise improving the roadway or street proper, on the real estate abutting on each side of the street improved; provided, that before any street, or portion of a street, shall be so improved, the persons owning real estate which has at least one third of the fronting on the street, or portion of a street, the improvement of which is desired, shall, in writing, request the commissioners of streets and sewers to make such improvements, and said commissioners shall have approved the same, and shall forward the same, with their approval, to the mayor and general council, with a statement of the character of the improvement proposed to be made, and an estimate of the cost of the same, and said mayor and general council shall by ordinance direct the said work to be done." Acts 1880-81, pp. 359, 360.

The Act proceeds to confer power to adopt by ordinance a system of equalizing assessments, and prorating the cost "on the real estate according to its frontage on the street, or portion of a street, so improved." It declares "that the amount of assessment on each piece of real estate shall be a lien on said real estate from the date of the passage of the ordinance providing for the work and making the assessment;" and it gives the mayor and general council "authority to enforce the collection of the amount of any assessment so made for work . . . upon streets, by executions to be issued by the clerk of council against the real estate so assessed, and against the owner thereof, at the date of the ordinance making the assessment, which execution may be levied by the marshal of said City on such real estate; and after advertisement and other proceedings, as in cases of sale for city taxes, the same may be sold at public outcry to the highest bidder, and such sale shall vest an absolute title in the purchaser: provided, that the defendant shall have a right to file an affidavit to contest the amount due, etc. Id. p. 360.

It only requires that language shall be taken in its ordinary signification, in conformity to the rule of construction laid down in section 4 of the Code, for us to be able to hold, not as a conjecture, but with absolute certainty, that the terms, "real estate abutting on each side of the street improved," include all lands so abutting, no matter to whom they belong, nor how the buildings upon them may be occupied or used. Church property, therefore, is manifestly within the letter of the Act, and as clearly within it as any other property whatsoever. The grant of power to assess it is no less express than is the grant of power to assess any other. The Act neither makes nor hints at any discrimination, but uses words which embrace all real estate as appropriately and completely as they embrace any part of the same. It would be as consistent with the letter of the Statute to deny that it comprehends any real estate at all as to deny that it comprehends all that abuts on the street. This is the plain truth; and yet the opinion of the court in 76 Ga. 187, 188, launches the argument by referring to the rule that no corporation can exercise any power not expressly conferred or necessarily implied; and after observing that places of religious worship, etc., are not brought directly by name within the provisions of the Act, adds: "And we do not think they can be brought within it by construction or necessary implication, unless it is made to appear that the property so exempted from taxation is used for purposes of 'private or corporate profit or income.'" This seems to be the fundamental error of the opinion. It treats the City as invoking implication, whereas the City points to an express grant, and the Church invokes implication to limit the words of the grant. True, church property is not brought in by its special name, nor is any other; the name applied to all alike being "real estate abutting on each side of the street improved." The property now in question, though belonging to a religious corporation, and used exclusively for worship and church purposes, is "real estate," and it abuts on Marietta Street,—the street improved. The true and only problem is whether it can be taken out of the Act by implication, not whether it can be brought in. The Legislature, by not excepting any real estate whatever, has put it in; and no consistent and enforced construction of the Act can be arrived at without setting out from this standpoint. To deny the natural import of the words of a statute, and thus exclude from them something that they evidently comprehend, and then to argue that this same thing cannot be brought in by implication, is to expel the occupant, and then keep him out because he was never in. If the words, "the real estate abutting on each side of the street improved," are not definite and free from all manner of ambiguity, no words can be. And yet, clear and definite as they are, we can be morally certain that they comprehend more than the Legislature intended they should; for they cover, by their letter, public as well as private property, and subject the whole alike to assessment, lien, levy and sale. That the public property of the United States, the State, the county or the city was intended to be dealt with thus is so improbable that we can have no hesitation in holding that an implied exception as to all public property can and should be engrafted upon the Act by construction. And just here the real question in its ultimate form emerges: Can a like exception in favor of church property—which all will agree is not public, but strictly private, property—be recognized and the words of the Statute still further narrowed by construction so as to exclude it also? No answer to this question is afforded by citing the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the General Assembly to exempt church property as well as public property from taxation, and citing with it the Act of 1878 (Code, § 798), by which the power was exercised throughout its whole extent, and thereby, for the time being, exhausted. This court has ruled in Hayden v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 817,—a case which arose out of the identical Statute we are now construing,—that the taxation to which that power relates is taxation for revenue, and not local assessments for the improvement of streets, which latter are in the nature of an interchange of equivalents between the public and the owners of property locally benefited by the improvement. By general and now almost unanimous concurrence throughout the jurisprudence of the American States, there is an essential difference between the two species of taxation; and many rules, whether constitutional or statutory, which govern the former are without application to the latter. See, besides, the citations in Hayden v. Atlanta, supra; Birmingham v. Klein, 89 Ala. 461, 8 L. R. A. 869; Speer v. Athens, 85 Ga. 49, 9 L. 12 L. R. A.

R. A. 402; 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 777, 778.

Consistency requires that when the Constitution has been ruled, as in Hayden v. Atlanta, not to apply to local assessments, its provisions on the subject of taxation should not be treated as authority, direct or indirect, for holding property of any kind exempt from such assessments. If it supplies no rule for levying assessments, and declares no exemption from their imposition, what control can it possibly have when a statute on the subject of assessments is under construction? To appeal to it in the discussion is either to recede from the doctrine that it is silent on assessments, or to invoke what it says on one subject to limit what the Legislature has expressly said when treating of another. Surely, the mere grouping of church property with public property, first by the Constitution, and then by the Statute, in dealing with taxation proper, is no sufficient reason for concluding that the Legislature intended that they should stand upon the same footing in the law of local assessments, where no such intention has been anywhere declared. The argument that because the Legislature, under express authority granted to it by the Constitution, has expressly exempted church property from taxation, therefore it has impliedly exempted it from local assessment, is manifestly fallacious. The Constitution itself exempts nothing, not even public property; it only gives authority to the General Assembly to make certain exemptions. Without some express promulgation of the legislative will, no private property whatever could claim exemption from general taxation. How can a system of express exemption from such taxation be a legitimate premise from which to conclude that the Legislature intends a system of implied exemption as to certain private property to run through its enactments on the subject of local assessments? Having once made the distinction between the two species of taxation, and professing still to adhere to it, we ought to accept its consequences. In no other way can consistency be maintained; and nothing inconsistent is law, for the law is never in conflict with itself, nor one part with another part.

It may be said, however, that the opinion we are reviewing does not cite the Constitution, and the Statute under it exempting church property from taxation, as authority, direct or indirect, but only as evincing on the part of the State a friendly spirit and disposition towards religious institutions and instrumentalities. For this purpose we concede the citation would be legitimate. The Constitution defines very explicitly the fiscal relation which the State is to bear to religion. It declares, on the one hand (Code, § 5006): "No money shall ever be taken from the public treasury, directly or indirectly, in aid of any church, sect, or denomination of religionists, or of any sectarian institution."

This settles it that the State shall pay nothing to the Church. It declares, on the other hand (Id. §§ 5181, 5182, 5184): "All taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws.

The General Assembly may, by law, exempt from taxation all public property; places of religious worship or burial; all institutions of purely public charity; all buildings erected for and used as a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning; the real and personal estate of any public library, and that of any other literary association, used by or connected with such library; all books and philosophical apparatus; and all paintings and statuary of any company or association kept in a public hall, and not held as merchandise, or for purposes of sale or gain: provided, the property so exempted be not used for purposes of private or corporate profit or income.

All laws exempting property from taxation, other than the property herein enumerated, shall be void." This settles it that the church, like other proprietors, shall pay taxes upon its whole property, unless the Legislature shall think proper to exempt its places of religious worship, etc., not used for purposes of private or corporate profit or income. All property of the church not embraced in this power of exemption stands, with reference to the State, upon exactly the same footing as if it belonged to individuals, and had no connection with religious uses whatever. With respect to it, there can be no exemption from general taxation expressly granted; much less any resulting from implication only. And the scheme of the Constitution evidently is to have no implied exemptions at all; certainly none other than of public property. It may be that were the Legislature to lay a tax for the benefit of the State upon all property, without having declared any exemption whatever, the Statute might be construed as impliedly excepting public property; but no court, we apprehend, would feel warranted in extending the implication to church property. Thus the matter stands with reference to the species of taxation with which the Constitution deals, to wit, taxation for revenue. The policy of the State, as indicated by the Constitution, is to make no discrimination in favor of property devoted to religious purposes save by express statute. While the Legislature is empowered to extend favor to such property, it is expected to do so, if at all, by express provision. And such is now our whole statutory scheme with reference to churches and religion. The policy is to favor them,—favor them highly,—but to leave no favor whatever to implication. This is shown by the opinion we are reviewing. It correctly refers to a great number of topics in respect to which favors have been granted, but they have all been exaggerated. In the whole range of our state legislation since the adoption of the Code, we know of no instance in which the Legislature has been understood to intend any favor or privilege in behalf of the church which it has failed to set down and specify in express terms. Taking the Code and all our statutes together, we have a comprehensive and specific enumeration of particulars, in respect to which religion and those engaged in its ministrations are preferred or favored. But surely this is no warrant for a court to add to these favors by construction or implication. On the contrary, as the Legislature has expressed so much, the inference ought to be that its expressions are co-extensive with its will and intention.

Glancing now at the current of authority, let us see how the stream runs. In People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 456, the supreme court of that State says: "The meaning of taxation must be kept in view; and that is, a charge levied by the sovereign power upon the property of its subject. It was not a charge upon its own property, nor upon property over which it has no dominion. This excludes the property of the State, whether lands, revenue or other property, and the property of the United States." Accordingly, it was held in Doyle v. Austin, 47 Cal. 353, that a statute providing for the opening of a street, and for the payment of the expenses by assessment upon the lands benefited, was not vitiated by an express exception from liability in making the assessment of lands belonging to the United States, the State of California, and the city, respectively, although it appeared by the report of the assessors that these lands would be benefited to the extent of $800,000. That property belonging to the public, and held for public uses, is exempt from taxation when not expressly subjected thereto, is held in the following cases: Rochester v. Bush, 80 N. Y. 302; Schuykill County Directors of Poor v. North Manheim Twp. School Directors, 42 Pa. 21; Louisville v. Com. 1 Duvall, 295. The same rule prevails as to assessments for local improvements of a public nature. Worcester County v. Worcester, 116 Mass. 193; Baltimore County Comrs. v. Board of Managers of Maryland Hospital, 62 Md. 127; State v. Hartford, 3 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 610, the editor citing 49 Conn. 89, which is a mis-citation.

In Missouri, it would seem, an exemption is not implied in favor of all public property. St. Louis Public Schools v. St. Louis, 26 Mo. 468. And in Illinois, under the Constitution of 1870, such exemptions are not implied. Adams County v. Quincy, 130 Ill. 566. In New York, certain words contained in a city charter were construed to subject property of the State to assessment for the improvement of a street. Hassan v. Rochester, 67 N. Y. 528. In Texas (Harris County v. Boyd, 70 Tex. 287), an exemption in the Constitution protecting the property of counties, cities and towns, held only for public purposes, from forced sale and from taxation, was ruled to extend to an assessment against a court-house for the improvement of a street. It is manifest, however, that this decision could have been rested upon the general principle announced by the courts of Massachusetts, Maryland and Connecticut, to the effect that public property is not included in the statutes for local assessments unless specially named.

Implied exceptions in favor of public property also prevail over general words in a statute founded on the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Atlanta v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 58 Ga. 120; St. Louis, J. & O. R. Co. v. Trustees, 48 Ill. 308.

We thus see that to engraft an exception upon the amended charter of Atlanta in favor of public property has the sanction of authority. But no such rule prevails, so far as we know or have been able to ascertain, in favor of private property used for religious purposes. In the following cases, churches, although not expressly named in assessment statutes, were held to be subject to assessment for local improvements, notwithstanding they were exempt by express law from general taxation: Re New York, 11 Johns. 77. And see Harlem P. Church v. New York, 5 Hun. 442; Re Second Ave. M. E. Church, 66 N. Y. 395; People v. Syracuse, 2 Hun. 438; Northern Liberties v. St. John's Church, 13 Pa. 104; Lefevre v. Detroit, 2 Mich. 586; Ottawa v. Trustees of Free Church, 20 Ill. 423; Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 8 Bush. 508; Lockwood v. St. Louis, 24 Mo. 20. And see Pt. Wayne First P. Church v. Pt. Wayne, 86 Ind. 338; Second Universalist Soc. v. Providence, 6 R. I. 285. The like rule has been applied to cemeteries. Baltimore v. Green Mt. Cemetery, 7 Md. 517; Buffalo City Cemetery v. Buffalo, 46 N. Y. 506; Lima v. Cemetery Asso. 42 Ohio St. 128. And to hospitals, asylums, and other charitable institutions. Sheehan v. Good Samaritan Hospital, 50 Mo. 155; Lafayette v. Male Orphan Asylum, 4 La. Ann. 1; Bouton Seaman's Friend Soc. v. Boston, 116 Mass. 181. And see

Chicago v. Baptist Theological Union, 115 Ill. 245, 3 West. Rep. 96; Re St. Joseph's Asylum 69 N. Y. 853. Also, to institutions of learning, etc. Re College Street, 8 R. I. 474.

If express words are requisite to exempt private property from general taxation there is no reason why like words are not equally necessary to exempt it from assessments. Lima v. Cemetery Asso. supra. Instances of such express exemption are furnished by State v. Newark, 86 N. J. L. 478; State v. St. Paul, 86 Minn. 529. But in Chicago v. Baptist Theological Union, 115 Ill. 245, 3 West. Rep. 96, it was held that even an express exemption from assessment could not be granted, under the Constitution of Illinois, because violative of the principle of equality. Inasmuch as the Constitution of Georgia neither expressly nor by implication lays down any principle whatever touching local assessments, being entirely silent on the subject, there would seem to be no defect of power in the Legislature to spare churches from such assessments at pleasure. We rule, not that the Legislature might not have granted the exemption now contended for, had it been so disposed, but that it has not done so. The question of legal discrimination in favor of church property over secular property, in the matter of bearing burdens, is one of public policy; and it is for the Legislature, not the courts, to mould that policy and proclaim it. The services of religion to the State are of untold value; but it is the glory of religion in this country that it serves as a volunteer, without money and without price.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Many of the questions raised by the pleadings in this case have been considered and adjudicated in recent decisions of this court. New England Mort. Secur. Co. v. Ingram (Ala.) 9 So. Rep. 140; Nelms v. Edinburg Am. L. Mort. Co. Id. 141; American F. L. Mort. Co. v. Sewell, Id. 148.

The one question of supreme importance presented for review in this record did not arise in either of the foregoing cases cited. On or about May 1, 1888, in order to procure a loan from the New England Mortgage Security Co., J. S. Farrior and his wife, Minnie E. Farrior, executed a promissory note to the company, and secured the same by mortgage on certain lands in Lowndes County, Ala. By deed of conveyance executed by J. S. Farrior to his wife on the 3d of October, 1882, a part of these lands were conveyed to her to pay and satisfy an indebtedness of the husband to the wife. The consideration of this deed is stated to be for "two thousand and seven dollars, the amount of money and property used and converted of the corpus of the separate estate of the wife." At the time the note and mortgage was made to secure the loan, the wife had no legal capacity to bind her statutory estate by mortgage or other contract, but she could bind her equitable separate estate as if she were a feme sole. By repeated decisions of this court in reference to the Married Woman's Law creating in the wife a statutory separate estate, it was held that a conveyance of lands from the husband to the wife vested in the wife an equitable separate estate; and this was the effect of such conveyance, notwithstanding the consideration was property the corpus of her statutory estate, or indebtedness of the husband on account of money, the corpus of her statutory estate, used and converted by him. These decisions of the supreme court of this State, thus construing the Statute, and declaring the character of the estate conveyed to the wife, and her capacity to incur it by contract, were in force at the time the note and mortgage involved in the present case were executed. Turner v. Kelly, 70 Ala. 85; Goodlett v. Hansell, 66 Ala. 161; McMillan v. Peacock, 57 Ala. 129.

Subsequent to this time, but before the filing of complainant's bill, the supreme court of the State overruled these authorities, and held that "by no contract between the husband and wife can her statutory separate estate be converted into an equitable estate, with power in the wife to charge it," and expressly and "intentionally" overruled the former decisions which hold to the contrary. Loeb v. McCullough, 78 Ala. 583; Jordan v. Smith, 88 Ala. 302; Parker v. Marks, 83 Ala. 548. The reasons pro and con, upon which the different decisions rest, need not be here reconsidered. The court adheres to the later decisions and reaffirms the rule of law declared in Loeb v. McCullough, and quoted supra.

The question presented for consideration is the effect of the later decision upon contracts and rights of property acquired under the Statute, as construed by the former decisions, and while those decisions were in force. It has been repeatedly declared in repeated decisions by the highest tribunal in this country, and many eminent jurists, that a fixed and received construction of a statute made by the supreme court of the State makes a part of such statute law. Green v. Neal, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 297, 8 L. ed. 404; Shelby v. Guy, 24 U. S. 11 Wheat. 868, 6 L. ed. 497.

In the case of Ohio L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Debois, 57 U. S. 16 How. 433, 14 L. ed. 1008, Taney, Ch. J., held "that the sound and true rule was, that, if the contract when made was valid by the laws of the State, as then expounded by all the departments of its government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent Act of the Legislature or decisions of its court altering the construction of the law."

In the case of Taylor v. Ypsilanti, 105 U. S. 72, 26 L. ed. 1012, this authority was reaffirmed, and also the case of Douglass v. Pike County, reported in 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 996, in which it was held that "the true rule is to give a change of judicial construction in respect to a statute the same effect in its operation on contracts and existing contract rights that would be given to a legislative amendment, that is to say, make it prospective, but not retroactive.

statute, such adjudications are conclusive. People v. Briggs, 114 N. Y. 63; People v. Arensberg, 7 Cent. Rep. 247, 105 N. Y. 123; People v. West, 8 Cent. Rep. 758, 106 N. Y. 293; People v. Kibler, 8 Cent. Rep. 761, 106 N. Y. 321.

After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself. Davenport German Sav. Bank v. Franklin County, 128 U. S. 626, 32 L. ed. 519, citing Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 996; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 356; Green County v. Conness, 109 U. S. 104, 27 L. ed. 872; Anderson v. Santa Anna Twp. 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 632.

So where a judicial construction has been given to a statute, the re-enactment of the statute is generally held to be in effect a legislative adoption of the construction. Dollar Sav. Bank v. United States, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 227, 23 L. ed. 80.

And the Legislature, in adopting the statute of another State, adopts with it the judicial construction of that State, as understood at the time. Trabant v. Rummel, 14 Or. 17; Lindley v. Davis, 6 Mont. 453; Pratt v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 1 New Eng. Rep. 764, 141 Mass. 225.

The judicial construction of a statute is part of the law. See note to Ryalls v. Mechanics Mills (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 637.

After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of decision is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." The following authorities hold the same rule: Olcott v. Fond du Lac County Supra. 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 689, 21 L. ed. 386; Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 52, 25 L. ed. 546; Carroll County Supra. v. United States, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 71, 21 L. ed. 771; Gelspeke v. Dubuque, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 206, 17 L. ed. 525.

Sutherland on Statutory Construction (§ 819), says: "A judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and as to rights which accrue afterwards it should be adhered to for the protection of these rights. To devest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively. The constitutional barrier to legislation impairing the obligation of contracts applies also to decisions altering the law as previously expounded, so as to affect the obligations of existing contracts made on the faith of the earlier adjudications."

In the case of Geddes v. Brown, 5 Phila. 180, the facts were that in the year 1848 the Legislature passed a law enlarging the power of married women over their property, and enabling them to deal with it in many respects as if they were single. The supreme court of the State declared that under this law a married woman might convey or incur property settled to her separate use. On the faith of this case, the mortgagee took his mortgage. By a subsequent decision of the supreme court the former decision was overruled, and it was held that property settled to the separate use of a married woman could not be alienated unless the power was conferred by the deed. The decision of the court in Geddes v. Brown was (and it is only the conclusion of the court that we cite) that a party who acts in accordance with the law as laid down by the highest tribunal in the State, while it is still law, shall not suffer because it is subsequently set aside, and another and inconsistent rule substituted for it. The validity of the mortgage was upheld in the case cited. Endlich, on the Interpretation of Statutes (§ 868), holds that a "judicial interpretation of a statute becomes a part of the statute law, and a change of it is, in practical effect, the same as a change of the statute." The author cites, with other cases to sustain the text, the case of Geddes v. Brown, supra.

It is contended that the reverse of these principles have been recognized, if not fairly held, in this State, and we have been referred to the case of Prince v. Prince, 67 Ala. 565, and Boyd v. State, 53 Ala. 608. In the first case the contention was that, as the Statute had not been construed when the mortgage which gave rise to the litigation was executed, the grave doubt among members of the legal profession "as to the proper construction of the Statute was a sufficient consideration to uphold a compromise of the mortgage debt." The court held that everyone was required to know the proper construction of the Statute, applying the maxim, ignorantia facti excusat, 12 L. R. A.

ignorantia juris non excusat. The question was not before the court in that case. In the latter case (Boyd v. State, 53 Ala. 615) the present chief justice rendered the opinion, and on an application for a rehearing expressly called attention to the fact that a different principle controlled the conclusion of the court in the Boyd Case from that held in the authorities referred to in this opinion, and declared that "in none of them was it decided or contended that any right existed or could be maintained which rested alone on a statute which the court pronounced unconstitutional." This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (94 U. S. 648, 24 L. ed. 308), in which it was held that "the constitutionality of the Act was not drawn in question" by the previous decisions of the state court so as to necessitate a decision of that question. The case of Bibb v. Bibb, 79 Ala. 444, though limiting the principle in its application to the subject matter of the particular litigation, clearly recognized the right of parties acquired under decisions of the supreme court in the following pertinent language: "The quieting of litigation; the public peace and repose; respect for judicial administration of the law, and confidence in its reasonable certainty, stability and consistency; and all considerations of public policy,—call for permanently upholding acts done, contracts executed, rights vested, and titles to property acquired on the faith of decisions of the court of last resort." Persons contracting are presumed to know the existing law, but neither they nor their legal advisers are expected to know the law better than the courts, or to know what the law will be at some future day. Any principle or rule which deprives a person of property acquired by him, or the benefit of the contract entered into, in reliance upon and strict compliance with the law in all respects as interpreted and promulgated by the court of last resort at the time of the transaction, and no fault can be imputed to him unless it be held a fault not to foresee and provide against future alterations in the construction of the law, must be radically wrong. Such a principle or rule of law would clog business transactions, unsettle titles, and destroy all confidence in the decisions of the supreme court of the State. We hold the doctrine to be sound and firmly established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and enunciated by many eminent text-writers, that rights to property, and the benefits of investments acquired by contract, in reliance upon a statute as construed by the supreme court of the State, and which were valid contracts, under the statute as thus interpreted, when the contracts or investments were made, cannot be annulled or devested by subsequent decisions of the same court overruling the former decisions; that as to such contracts or investments it will be held that the decisions which were in force when the contracts were made had established a rule of property upon which the parties had a right to rely, and that subsequent decisions cannot retract so as to impair rights acquired in good faith under a statute as construed by the former decisions. The application of these principles leads to an affirmation of the decision of the lower court.

Affirmed.

Gustavus C. KILGORE

v.

Frank U. RICH.

(....Me....)

1. An infant's board-bill while attending school is included among the necessities for which he may be compelled to pay.
2. One who pays an infant's debt for necessities at the infant's request has a good cause of action against him for the reasonable value of such necessities.

(April 7, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Waldo County (Walton, J.) made during the trial of an action upon an account to which defendant interposed the plea of infancy, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Exceptions overruled.

NOTE.—The governing rule.

The question of necessities is governed by the real circumstances of the infant, and not by what its situation may appear to be. An infant when at home, under the care of his father and supported by him, cannot be made liable for necessities. If he could be made liable, the father would be deprived of the right of exercising his discretion as to the manner and degree of his support. Bainbridge v. Pickering, 2 W. Bl. 1325; Angel v. McLehlan, 18 Mass. 81; Elrod v. Myers, 2 Head, 58; Connolly v. Hull, 8 McCord, L. & Tyler, Infancy and Coverture, p. 107.

Classification of infants' contracts.

The contracts of infants are usually divided into three classes, namely: such as are binding, such as are void and such as are voidable only. The distinctions laid down in a case which has been frequently approved are, that where the court can pronounce that the contract is for the benefit of the infant, as, for instance, for necessities, there it shall bind him; when it can pronounce it to be to his prejudice, it is voidable only, and it is in the election of the infant to affirm it or not. Keane v. Boycott, 2 H. Bl. 511. And see Reg. v. Lord, 12 Q. B. 757; United States v. Bainbridge, 1 Mason, 58; Wheaton v. East, 5 Yerg. 41; Cronise v. Clark, 4 Md. Ch. 408; 2 Kent, Com. 236; Robinson v. Weeks, 55 Me. 102; Baltimore Monumental Bldg. Asso. No. 2 v. Herman, 38 Md. 128.

Infants' contracts for necessities enforceable.

It is a well-established doctrine that contracts for "necessaries" are binding upon an infant; but even upon such contracts, only the value of the articles furnished can be recovered (Hyer v. Hyatt, 8 Cranch, C. C. 276; Parsons v. Keys, 48 Tex. 557); and all the authorities concur in the rule that if an infant live with his parent or guardian, who duly cares and provides for him, he cannot bind himself for necessities. Kraker v. Byrum, 13 Rich. L. 163; Walling v. Toll, 9 Johns. 141; Guthrie v. Murphy, 4 Watts, 80.

Nor is he liable for necessities merely because his father is poor and unable himself to pay for them. Hoyt v. Casey, 114 Mass. 397, 19 Am. Rep. 371.

Law implies a promise to pay.

Ordinarily when one renders to another valuable 12 L. R. A.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. William H. Fogler, for defendant: Until a person is twenty-one years of age he is, in law, an infant, and is incapable of entering into a binding contract.

If he live with his parents or guardian, who duly care and provide for him, he cannot bind himself for necessities.

Walling v. Toll, 9 Johns. 141; Swift v. Bennett, 10 Cush. 486; Connolly v. Hull, 8 McCord, L. 6. See Bainbridge v. Pickering, 2 W. Bl. 1325; Ford v. Fothergill, 1 Esp. 211.

Nor can he bind himself for necessities because his father is poor and unable to pay for them.

Hoyt v. Casey, 114 Mass. 397.

He is liable for money borrowed by him to pay for necessities, even if the money borrowed be expended for such necessities.

Schouler, Dom. Rel. 555; 1 Bl. Com. 466, note.

An infant is liable for necessities suitable to service, the law will imply a promise to pay therefor by him for whom such service is rendered, and this upon the ground that as such party cannot infer service of this character to be gratuitous, it must be implied that he promised to pay for it; but no such implication can arise against a minor residing with his father, delivering over to him his wages and entitled to look to him for support. Hoyt v. Casey, 114 Mass. 397, 19 Am. Rep. 371.

We consider it by all means the better and sounder doctrine that an action can be maintained against an infant upon his negotiable paper given for necessities, either by the original payee or by one subsequent holder, and that the plaintiff may recover the full face of the paper, or so much thereof as represents the reasonable value of the necessities, for infancy can be shown, and the consideration, therefore, of the paper be inquired into, no matter who may be plaintiff. Bradley v. Pratt, 23 Vt. 378; Earle v. Reed, 10 Met. 387; Dubose v. Wheddon, 4 McCord, L. 231; Aaron v. Harley, 6 Rich. L. 26; Askey v. Williams, 74 Tex. 304. And see Rainwater v. Durham, 2 Nott & McC. 524, 10 Am. Dec. 637.

In Bradley v. Pratt, supra, Redfield, J., said: "I do not well comprehend why, upon principle, any express contract may not be said to be binding upon him, when it is shown to have been given for necessities, and the price to have been reasonable, if it be one where the consideration may be inquired into. . . . And as confessedly the infant may prima facie avoid his note or bill by merely showing the fact of his infancy at the time of making the contract, what is the impropriety in allowing the plaintiff to recover in all cases by showing the consideration to be for necessities?"

In Askey v. Williams, 74 Tex. 304, it was well remarked: "We apprehend the better doctrine to be that an infant may make an express written contract for necessities upon which he may be sued, but that by showing that the price agreed to be paid was unreasonable, he can reduce the recovery to a just compensation for the necessities received by him. It is to his benefit to hold the express contract not void, but voidable; for if it be voidable merely, he can secure the advantage of a good bargain, and may relieve himself of it if it be a bad one, while, on the other hand, to hold it void would deprive him of the benefit of an advantageous contract." See extended note to the case of Craig v. Van Bebber, 100 Mo. 524, 18 Am. St. Rep. 569.

his rank and condition, when he can obtain them only by pleading his personal credit.

Kline v. L'Amoureux, 2 Paige, 419, 2 L. ed. 971.

An infant is liable to a person who furnishes or advances money on credit for the purchase of necessities, provided he would be liable if the necessities were purchased on his own credit.

Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368; Swift v. Bennett, supra.

In the case at bar, at the time the money was paid by the plaintiff, the board had been furnished to the defendant upon either his credit or that of his father. Neither the defendant's necessities, his comfort nor his welfare required that the plaintiff should pay the debt thereby contracted.

Mr. Joseph Williamson, for plaintiff:

Since the days of Lord Coke, education has been recognized as one of the necessities for an infant equally with proper meat, drink, and apparel.

Co. Litt. 173.

What are necessities.

To determine in all cases what articles are, under the circumstances and conditions of the case, and what are not, necessities, is a determination of great delicacy. Mr. Lawson, in his well-known work on "Rights, Remedies and Practice," in vol. 2, at § 829, gives an exhaustive enumeration of the articles deemed necessary and others considered not, and sustains the position of his text by a formidable array of authority. From the decisions there cited it appears that necessities are not simply such things as are absolutely necessary for the existence and support of the infant, but include all such articles as are requisite to maintain him in his station of life. Leake, Cont. 549; Breed v. Judd, 1 Gray, 458; Story, Sales, 34, 35.

While infants are liable for necessities purchased by them when not supplied by the parent or guardian, they are not bound by an agreement to pay a particular sum. Whether the articles purchased were necessities, and whether the sum agreed to be paid was a fair price, are questions to be determined by the court. Parsons v. Keys, 48 Tex. 557.

In McKanna v. Merry, 61 Ill. 179, the rule is stated to be, that "the articles furnished or money advanced must be actually necessary, in the particular case, for use, not mere ornament; for substantial good, not mere pleasure; and must belong to the class which the law generally pronounces necessary for infants. Boarding, lodging, food, medicine and education are clearly necessities. Watson v. Cross, 2 Duv. 147; Hyman v. Cain, 8 Jones, L. 111; Bradley v. Pratt, 23 Vt. 378; Glover v. Ott, 1 McCord, L. 572; Peters v. Fleming, 6 Mees. & W. 48; Stone v. Dennison, 13 Pick. 6, 23 Am. Dec. 654; Squier v. Hydliff, 9 Mich. 274; Wilhelm v. Hardman, 13 Md. 144.

But an oversupply of goods, otherwise necessary, ceases to be a supply of necessities as to the excess. Johnson v. Lines, 6 Watts & S. 30, 40 Am. Dec. 543.

An infant who buys goods not necessities, on credit, and does not return them, is liable for so much of the price as is equal to the benefit derived from the purchase. Hall v. Butterfield, 59 N. H. 354, 47 Am. Rep. 209; Bartlett v. Bailey, 59 N. H. 408.

But other things also fall within the definition. Accordingly, the following have been held to be necessities: an attorney's services in defending him in a bastardy proceeding (Barker v. Hibbard, 54 N. H. 539, 30 Am. Rep. 160); or counsel fees in recovering his estate (Epperson v. Nugent, 57 Miss. 45, 34 Am. Rep. 434); or prosecuting an action for Money paid for an infant for necessities is recoverable from him.

If money be laid out for reasonable necessities furnished an infant, he is liable to the person advancing the money.

An infant is liable to an action at the suit of a person advancing money to a third party to pay for necessities furnished to the infant.

Swift v. Bennett, 10 Cush. 436; Randall v. Sweet, 1 Denio, 460; Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368; 3 Bacon, Abr. 394.

Peters, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury found that at the request of the defendant, then an infant, the plaintiff paid for him a board bill which he had previously contracted while attending school. It was ruled at the trial that the expense of an infant's board while attending school might be regarded as necessities. The correctness of this ruling is perhaps unquestioned. At all events, Coke's breach of promise of marriage (Munson v. Washband, 31 Conn. 308, 38 Am. Dec. 151); horses, in England (Hart v. Prater, 1 Jur. 623); contra, in this country (Bainwater v. Durham, 2 Nott & McC. 524, 10 Am. Dec. 687; Grace v. Hale, 2 Humph. 27, 38 Am. Dec. 296); livery for a servant (Hands v. Slaney, 8 T. R. 578); watches (Peters v. Fleming, 6 Mees. & W. 48); wedding clothes (Sams v. Stockton, 14 B. Mon. 332); or a bridal outfit (Jordan v. Coffield, 70 N. C. 110). And the following have been held to be not necessities: articles merely for adornment (Lefils v. Sugg, 15 Ark. 187); cigars and tobacco (Bryant v. Richardson, L. R. 8 Exch. 23, note); a college education (Middlebury College v. Chandler, 18 Vt. 683, 42 Am. Dec. 537); an insurance policy (New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Noyes, 32 N. H. 345); jewelry (Ryder v. Wombwell, L. R. 8 Exch. 90); repairs to the infant's dwelling-house (Tupper v. Cadwell, 13 Met. 559, 46 Am. Dec. 704); rent of a building for carrying on a trade or manual occupation (Lowe v. Griffith, 1 Scott. 458, 1 Hodges, 30); goods to carry on his trade with (Mason v. Wright, 13 Met. 306; Stone v. Withpool, 1 Latch, 21; Whittingham v. Hill, 1 Cro. Jac. 424; Whywall v. Campton, 2 Strange, 1063; Tuberville v. Whitehouse, 1 Car. & P. 94; Decell v. Lowenthal, 57 Miss. 331, 34 Am. Dec. 449); lumber to build a house (Freeman v. Bridger, 4 Jones, L. 1, 67 Am. Dec. 253); the board of horses, the principal use of which was in the infant's business of hackman, though occasionally used to carry his family out to ride (Merriman v. Cunningham, 11 Cush. 40); that where horseback exercise is prescribed by a physician, it is a necessity (Hart v. Prater, 1 Jur. 623); nor is a farrier's bill for work looking after the infant's horses (Clowes v. Brooke, 2 Strange, 1100, Andrew, 277); nor are saddles, bridles, whips, liquors, fiddles, fiddle-strings, powder and pistols, etc. (Beeler v. Young, 1 Bibb, 619; Glover v. Ott, 1 McCord, L. 572; McKanna v. Merry, 61 Ill. 179); nor is money lent to the minor a necessity (Barie v. Peale, 1 Salk. 237; Beeler v. Young, supra; Smith v. Gibson, Peake, Adm. Cas. 53; Darby v. Boucher, 1 Salk. 279; Probert v. Knouth, 2 Rep. 473, note; McKanna v. Merry, 61 Ill. 177), even though raised by mortgage to pay off a prior mortgage on property inherited by the infant (Magee v. Welsh, 18 Cal. 155; West v. Gregg, 1 Grant, Cas. 53, 114; Hicknell v. Hicknell, 111 Mass. 265); nor though raised at the request of the infant to relieve him from a draft for military duty (Dorrell v. Hastings, 28 Ind. 473); though if lent to procure a release from arrest for neces-enumeration of the kinds of necessities has always been accepted as true doctrine, which are these: "necessary meat, drink, apparel; necessary physic, and such other necessities, and likewise his good teaching or instruction, whereby he may profit himself afterwards."

It was also ruled at the trial that an infant, being liable to one person for such a bill, could make himself liable to another who should pay such bill for him at his request, the liability to such other person not to be measured by the amount actually paid, but limited, irrespective of the contract price, to such sum as would be a reasonable compensation for the board. This ruling does not appear to infringe against any legal principle, and an examination of the case satisfies us that it is well supported by the authorities.

The infant's liability is in no way enlarged by owing the debt to one rather than to another. The rule lends no temptation to create a debt as it is already created. The right to transfer the liability from one to another might be a great convenience to a minor. One creditor might be unable or unwilling to wait for payment, while a friend and acquaintance, as a substituted creditor, might be accommodating in that respect. It would give a self-supporting minor more facilities for support. We have not, in our examination of authorities, noticed any case that opposes the principle.

In Clarke v. Leslie, 5 Esp. 28, it was held that an infant who was threatened with arrest upon a process sued out against him on a debt for necessities would be liable to a person who, at his request, advanced money to release him. In that case there was legal pressure, but in many instances moral pressure would be great.

Swift v. Bennett, 10 Cush. 486, is a case where an infant bought an outfit for a whaling voyage, drawing for the amount of the bill on the plaintiffs, who accepted the bill, and paid it when it became due. They were allowed to collect of the infant what the goods were rea-saries, or if the infant is charged in execution, it is held to be recoverable; but to entitle the plaintiff so to recover, he must show that the money was advanced under such circumstances. Clarke v. Leslie, 5 Esp. 28.

So an infant is liable for money paid at his request to satisfy a debt which he had contracted for necessities. Randall v. Sweet, 1 Denio, 460.

Ends of the common law.

The common law has failed to make provision for enforcing moral or legal obligations of the parent to maintain and educate his minor child. Statutory enactment has, in part, supplied this omission, but, in the absence of such provision, the liability of the parent for the necessities furnished in the support and maintenance of his minor child is regarded as a legal obligation reposing upon an implied authorization from the parent.

The situation is well expressed by the Supreme Court of the State of New York. In the case of Raymond v. Loyl, 10 Barb. 488, Mr. Justice Hand, writing for reversal, and voicing the unanimous sentiment of the court, holds that there is no legal obligation on a parent to maintain his child independent of the statute. Hence the third person, who supplies an infant with necessities, cannot maintain an action against the parent therefor, unless the latter has expressly or impliedly contracted to pay the amount.

In Van Valkenburgh v. Watson, 18 Johns. 480, the court says, that if the parent neglects that duty any other person who supplies such necessities is deemed to have conferred a benefit on the delinquent parent, for which the law raises an implied promise on the part of the parent to pay; and Simpson v. Robertson, 1 Esp. 17, and Ford v. Fothergill, Id. 211, are cited.

An extract is also given from Bainbridge v. Pickering, 2 W. Bl. 1235. And Chancellor Walworth said, in Re Ryder, 11 Paige, 188, 5 L. ed. 101, that a stranger may furnish necessities for the child, and recover of the parent compensation therefor, where there is a clear and palpable omission of duty, on the part of the parent, in supplying a minor child with necessities. He cites Van Valkenburgh v. Watson, supra.

Chancellor Kent advances the same doctrine, and cites the same case, one in Connecticut, the two not prius cases from Bainbridge (supra) and Stone v. Carr, 3 Esp. 1.

Though stated so broadly, and by such eminent jurists, an examination of the cases throws doubt upon this position. Reeve was not a very careful writer. He cites 1 Bl. Com. 446, to show that it is a common-law duty of parents to support minor children. Blackstone says this duty is "a principle of natural law" (1 Bl. Com. 447). That "it is a principle of law, that there is an obligation on every man, to provide for those descended from his loins; and the manner in which this obligation shall be performed is thus pointed out;" and immediately refers to the provisions of the statutes on the subject; and adds, on the next page: "No person is bound to provide a maintenance for his issue, unless where the children are impotent and unable to work, either through infancy, disease, or accident, and then is only obliged to find them with necessities, the penalty on refusal being no more than 80 s. a month." And Mr. Chitty, in his note (1 Bl. Com. 448 a), says there is no legal obligation on a parent to maintain his child, independent of the statutes, and therefore a third person, who may relieve the latter, even from absolute want, cannot sue the parent for reasonable remuneration, unless he expressly or impliedly contracted to pay, and cites Le Blanc, J., Cooper v. Martin, 4 East, 84; Hunt v. Wotton, T. Raym. 260; Beshch v. Coghill, Palmer, 559; Baker v. Keen, 2 Starkie, 501. He adds that "the common law considered moral duties of this nature, like others of imperfect obligation, as better left in their performance to the impulses of nature."

The doctrine here laid down which relieves a father from liability for necessities furnished to his infant son in the absence of an express promise to defray such expense, or proof of such facts and circumstances as may imply such promise, is approved in Gotts v. Clark, 78 Ill. 280; McMillen v. Lee, 78 Ill. 445; Murphy v. Ottenheimer, 84 Ill. 40; Johnson v. Smallwood, 88 Ill. 75; Schnuckle v. Bierman, 89 Ill. 456.

That a parent is under an obligation to provide for the maintenance of his infant children is a principle of natural law; and it is upon this natural obligation alone that the duty of a parent to provide his infant children with necessities of life rests; for there is no rule of municipal law enforcing this duty. Hunt v. Thompson, 4 Ill. 179, 36 Am. Dec. 538.

Where it appears that the father has deserted his family, or has driven a child by cruel treatment from his home, the infant is said to have taken with him an authorization from the father for necessities furnished him, in order to relieve him from absolute want. Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 37; Poock v. Miller, 1 Hilt. 108; Townsend v. Burnham, 88 N. H. 270; Pidgin v. Oram, 8 N. H. 350; Owen v. White, 5 Port. (Ala.) 438.

sonably worth to him, in an action for money paid on his account. So in Conn v. Coburn, 7 N. H. 368, a person who signed an infant's note given for necessities, as a surety, was allowed, after payment of the note, to recover the amount paid, not upon the note, but as money paid for the benefit of the infant. Randall v. Sweet, 1 Denio, 460, is precisely in point in the present case.

The defendant relies on the rule generally prevailing in the cases that money is not a necessary, though lent to an infant who afterwards purchases necessities with it. "But," says Mr. Bishop, "one who pays money at his [infant's] request to a third person for necessities can recover it." Bishop, Cont. § 914. The difference is between lending or paying. Mr. Wharton (Wharton, Cont. § 72) finds the doctrine adopted in late American cases, that a person who lends money to an infant to purchase "specific necessities stands in the position of the tradesman who furnishes the necessities. In the case at bar the plaintiff could have taken an assignment of the claim, and been entitled to recover it; and there really is no good reason to defeat his claim as it is here presented.

Exceptions overruled.

1. Statutory prohibition of the guilty party to remarry within a certain time after

NORM.—Scope of legislative enactments.

Legislative enactments have no extraterritorial force, and when a state law forbids, in unqualified terms, the doing of an act, it must always be understood that the thing is only forbidden within the State. Charles v. People, 1 N. Y. 180; Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 403; National Trust Co. v. Gleason, 77 N. Y. 400; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18; Western Transp. & C. Co. v. Kilderhouse, 87 N. Y. 430.

The rights and incidents of a marriage, in the country where celebrated, shall follow and be allowed everywhere. Royal Bank of Scotland v. Cuthbert, 1 Rose, Cas. Bk. App. 481; Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 508, note a, 512.

The statute and decree prohibiting the marriage of the guilty party can have no effect beyond the territorial limits of the State. Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N. Y. 521.

A statute providing in general terms that the guilty party shall not marry after divorce applied only to divorces granted within the State. Bullock v. Bullock, 122 Mass. 8.

But whether a prohibition has any effect out of the State where the divorce is granted has been much disputed. In most States such a prohibition is regarded as a penalty. Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505, citing most of the cases decided prior to 1881.

In such States the incapacity to marry depends entirely upon the prohibition; the marriage relation is wholly dissolved. People v. Hovey, 5 Barb. 117; Moore v. Hegeman, 27 Hun, 68; Dickson v. Dickson, 1 Yerg. 110.

a decree of divorce has no force out of the State in which the decree is granted.

2. The Maine Statute prohibiting the guilty party in a divorce suit to remarry applies only to divorces granted by the courts in that State.

(March 12, 1891.)

CASE from Franklin County submitted upon an agreed statement of facts for the opinion of the full court in an action brought to recover compensation for poor supplies alleged to have been furnished by plaintiff to persons having a legal settlement in defendant Town. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Prince A. Sawyer, for plaintiff:

While the courts of one State can sunder the bonds of matrimony when the libellant is a resident within the jurisdiction of the court, and thus free both parties,—for when one ceases to be a husband the other ceases to be a wife,—yet no extraterritorial penalty or condition can be pronounced.

Stearns v. United States, 3 Paine, C. C. 301.

The marriage prohibition connected with the Massachusetts Divorce Laws does not affect a marriage contracted by the libellee in another State.

West Cambridge v. Lexington, 1 Pick. 510.

The prohibition of the libellee to marry again is in the nature of a penalty enacted by the State of Massachusetts, but "the courts of one sovereignty will not take cognizance of and enforce the Penal Code of another."

Stearns v. United States, supra.

Mr. H. L. Whitecomb for defendant.

Libbey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Constitutional provisions on the subject.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the Public Acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State." U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1.

And the Act of Congress of May 26, 1790, after providing for the mode of authenticating the Acts, records and judicial proceedings of the State, has declared, "And the said records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from whence the said records are or shall be taken." 1 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 123, chap. 11; U. S. Rev. Stat. p. 170, § 905. See Shumway v. Stillman, 4 Cow. 282; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 52 U. S. 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648; Mills v. Dur-yea, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 3 L. ed. 411; Wood v. Watkinson, 17 Conn. 500.

If a judgment is conclusive in the State where it is pronounced, it is equally conclusive everywhere. See Story, Const. § 1812.

It therefore follows that "if a court has jurisdiction in a divorce cause, valid according to the law of the State in which it is taken, and not obnoxious to principles of interstate comity, and it pronounces a divorce, and the decree has become matter of record in the court, it is binding in all the other States of the Union." 2 Bishop, Mar. and Div. § 199; Wait, Act. and Def. § 110.

The general doctrine stated.

The general doctrine is, that a decree of divorce—the plaintiff Town for the relief of Lorestein Hinkley, Ella R. Hinkley, as his wife, and Bernard C. Hinkley and Harry L. Hinkley, their sons.

By the agreement of the parties, it appears that Lorestein Hinkley had his legal settlement in the defendant town, and the right to recover for what was furnished him is admitted. The right to recover for the supplies furnished Ella R. and the two sons depends upon the legality of the marriage of said Lorestein and Ella R.

By the agreed facts, it appears that said Ella R. was legally married to one Wardwell of Clinton, in this State, May 25, 1879; that she and her husband afterwards moved to Massachusetts, where they separated, and she returned to this State; that while she was residing here a libel for divorce was commenced by her husband in the court of Massachusetts, duly served on her in this State, and that a decree nisi of divorce was granted by the court there in November, 1882, for the adultery of the wife, which was duly made absolute in November, 1883. Said Ella R. remained in this State, and on the 6th of September, 1884, was duly married to said Hinkley, in said Town of Phillips.

It is claimed by the defendants that by the Statute of Massachusetts, and of this State, in 1883, a husband or wife for whose fault a divorce was granted could not marry again within two years from the decree of divorce, and as that time had not elapsed when the paupers were married, in September, 1884, their marriage was illegal, and that Ella R. and her two sons do not take the pauper settlement of said Lorestein.

We think this contention is not sound. When the divorce was granted, Ella R. was no longer the wife of Wardwell. Burien v. Shannon, 115 Mass. 438; Com. v. Putnam, 1 Pick. 186. The prohibition to remarry within the time named was in the nature of a penalty. It had no force as a disability to remarry out of the State of Massachusetts. It did not attach to the person of the wife in this State. This rule is held in many courts. Cox v. Combs, 8 B. Mon. 281; People v. Chase, 28 Hun, 810; Ponsford v. Johnson, 2 Blatchf. 51; Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N. Y. 521; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18; Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N. Y. 602; Van Storch v. Griffin, 71 Pa. 240; Com. v. Lane, 118 Mass. 458.

Nor does the prohibition upon the guilty party to remarry by the Statute of this State attach to said Ella R. Our statute applies only to divorces granted by the courts in this State. It has no reference to a decree granted in another State. Bullock v. Bullock, 122 Mass. 3.

We think the marriage of said Lorestein and Ella R. was legal, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for the full amount claimed.

Defendants defaulted.

Peters, Ch. J., and Walton, Virgin, Haskell and Whitehouse, JJ., concur.

from the bond of matrimony, when unnumbered by any statutory limitations or restrictions, operates to release the parties respectively from all the obligations which the dissolved marriage imposed. In other words "with the dissolution the obligations arising from the marriage are completely discharged, and the parties stand in the same position as though such marriage had never been contracted." Field, Ch. J., in Barber v. Barber, 16 Cal. 378. And see Forrest v. Forrest, 8 Bosw. 661, 9 Abb. Pr. 286; People v. Hovey, 5 Barb. 117.

But in many of the States statutory restrictions and prohibitions have been placed on one or both of the parties to the divorce, and questions of much interest have arisen in respect to the extent of such restraints. Thus, under a general statute which authorizes a divorce and also forbids the guilty party to contract a second marriage during the lifetime of the innocent party, arises the question whether such guilty party may marry in any other State or country. And although, agreeably to the weight of authority, this question should be answered affirmatively (see West Cambridge v. Lexington, 1 Pick. 508; Ponsford v. Johnson, 2 Blatchf. 51; Clark v. Clark, 8 Cush. 386; Dickson v. Dickson, 1 Yerg. 110; yet, an opposite view has been entertained in some of the New York cases. See Cropey v. Ogden, 11 N. Y. 228; Smith v. Woodworth, 44 Barb. 198. See also Williams v. Oates, 5 Ired. L. 536; Wait, Act. and Def. art. 2, § 2.

In Harding v. Alden, 9 Me. 140, it was held, by the Supreme Judicial Court in Maine, that a decree of divorce did not fall within the rule that a judgment rendered against one not within the State, nor bound by its laws, nor amenable to its jurisdiction, was not entitled to credit against the defendants in another State; and that divorces pronounced according to the law of one jurisdiction, and the new relations thereupon formed, ought to be recognized, in the absence of all fraud, as operative and binding everywhere, so far as related to the dissolution of the marriage, though not as to other parts of the decree, such as an order for the payment of money by the husband. This is an important and valuable decision, and settles the question, so far as the judicial authority of a single State can do it, against the English rule, and places it upon the same principles of justice, good morals and policy which render a marriage valid by the law of the place where it was solemnized, valid everywhere. 2 Kent, Com. 13th ed. *110, note a.

A decree in a divorce suit will have no extraterritorial effect when the defendant is domiciled in another State, and is not served with process, nor with notice of the proceedings. Doughty v. Doughty, 28 N. J. Eq. 681.

We must concede that a State may adjudge the status of its citizen towards a nonresident; and may authorize to that end such judicial proceedings as it sees fit; and that other States must acquiesce, so long as the operation of the judgment is kept within its own confines. But that judgment cannot push its effect over the borders of another State, to the subversion of its laws and the defeat of its policy, nor seek across its bounds the person of one of its citizens, and fix upon him a status, against his will and without his consent, and in hostility to the laws of the sovereignty of his allegiance. People v. Baker, 76 N. Y. 78.

The courts of New York have no common-law jurisdiction over the subject of divorces, and their authority is confined altogether to the exercise of such express and incidental powers as are conferred by the statute. Griffin v. Griffin, 47 N. Y. 184; Davis v. Davis, 76 N. Y. 221; Kamp v. Kamp, 59 N. Y. 219.

The subject of divorce is exclusively regulated by statute, and actions relating thereto can only be maintained pursuant to statutory provisions. Combs v. Combs, 17 Abb. N. C. 265.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

STOWERS, Appt.,
v.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE CO.

(.....Miss.....)

Compensation for the erection of a telegraph line in a street must be made to abutting owners although the fee of the street is in the public and the right thereto cannot be defeated by the action of the municipal authorities.

(May 4, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Warren County sustaining a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been granted to restrain defendant from erecting poles in the street in front of complainant's property in the City of Vicksburg. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Birchett & Shelton for appellant.

Messrs. Warren Cowan and McIntosh, Williams & Russell for appellee.

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is some conflict in the authorities, but the decided weight is to the effect that telegraph lines form no part of the equipment of a public street, but are foreign to its use, and that where the abutting owner is the owner of the fee to the center of the street he is entitled to additional compensation for the additional burden placed upon his land. Lewis, Em. Dom. § 131, citing Board of Trade Telegr. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 507; Dusenbury

v. Mutual Telegr. Co. 11 Abb. N. C. 440; Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Colwell Lead Co. 18 Jones & S. 488; Tiffany v. United States Illum. Co. 19 Jones & S. 280; Broome v. New York & N. J. Telegr. Co. 42 N. J. Eq. 141, 5 Cent. Rep. 814. Contra, Hewitt v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 4 Mackey, 424; Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75; Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 5 West. Rep. 357, though the question was not involved in the decision of the case then before the court, Arnold, Ch. J., in Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. E. Co., 66 Miss. 279, 4 L. R. A. 785, stated, in delivering the opinion of the court, that there was no difference in right in cases where the owner of the abutting land owned the fee to the center of the street, and those in which the fee was in the public. To that declaration, and upon the authorities there cited, we now give the force of decision. It follows that it was not competent for the City of Vicksburg, by the action of its municipal authorities, to authorize the erection of the telegraph wires by the Telegraph Company, to the injury of appellant, without having first made compensation to him for the injury inflicted upon him. The authority granted by the municipality will protect the Company in its interference with the rights of the public, which is represented by the local authorities; but it cannot operate to withdraw from the appellant his right of property, and confer it upon the Company. That right is secured by constitutional provision, and can only be secured by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and upon due compensation being first made.

The decree is reversed, the injunction reinstated, and cause remanded.

NOTE.—Construction of telegraph line; rights of abutting owners.

The construction of a telegraph and telephone line on a railroad company's right of way imposes an additional servitude or burden on the land, for which the owners are entitled to compensation, unless constructed in good faith for the use of the railroad, and to facilitate the operation of its road. American Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Smith, 7 L. R. A. 300, 71 Md. 535.

A telegraph company cannot invoke the equitable power of the court to restrain interference by abutting owners with its poles in city streets, even though its lines have been erected by legislative sanction. Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. v. Colwell Lead Co. 67 How. Pr. 363.

Authority to construct, a mere license.

Statutes giving the right to telegraph companies to erect lines upon, over or under streets grant no interest in the streets, but at most confer a license which can be revoked by the Legislature at any time. American Rapid Telegr. Co. v. Hess, 125 N. Y. 641.

Even if they gave them any interest therein, it would be subject to the general power of the Legislature to regulate their use and remove such lines if they should become a nuisance. Ibid.

Telegraph lines erected in the streets of cities may be removed therefrom as a nuisance, under proper authority from the Legislature; and such removal is not a taking of property for public use. Ibid.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Constitutional Law.

An exceedingly interesting case discussing what is meant by "the law of the land," and the constitutional provision as to depriving persons of "property," decides that a statute providing that personal property of an intestate lunatic, if derived from an intestate husband or wife, shall go to the latter's next of kin, is unconstitutional. (Tenn.) 70.

A license tax on peddlers is not an unconstitutional regulation of commerce. (D. C.) 624.

An Indiana case of great importance upholds the power of the Legislature to regulate the pressure of natural gas in pipes within the State, and holds that such an exercise of police power does not constitute an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce. (Ind.) 652.

A mere innovation or change in the law does not impair the obligation of a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. (Pa.) 290.

The constitutional protection of the obligation of a contract, and the rule that it cannot be impaired by a change of decisions, is illustrated by a case deciding that a mortgagee's right under a mortgage given by a married woman when the state decisions held that she had capacity to make it cannot be affected by the overruling of those decisions. (Ala.) 856.

An important decision on the constitutionality of the Act of Congress known as the Anti-Trust Law sustains it in all respects. (C. M. D. Tenn.) 758.

Extradition.

That there is no duty to surrender fugitives to another government under the law of nations is declared by a very exhaustive opinion reviewing the authorities, both judicial and executive, although in conflict with the rule laid down by Kent and Story; and therefore under the Treaty of Mexico, which creates no obligation on the part of either government to surrender its own citizens, a citizen of the United States cannot be surrendered to Mexico as a fugitive. (D. C. W. D. Tex.) 589.

Appropriations; Assessments; Taxes.

The disposal of sewage by cities and towns forming one sixth of the State in population is a public purpose for which the Legislature can appropriate money. (Mass.) 417.

This does not prevent the Legislature from requiring such cities and towns to repay it, although they do not have the title to the works constructed for that purpose. Id.

The delegation to commissioners of the apportionment of the expense on the different cities and towns may be made without giving them any other rule than to apportion it as they shall deem just and equitable, subject to approval by a court, and the apportionment need not be based entirely on benefit to property. Id.

Coal in its natural state may be severed from the ownership of the realty for purposes of taxation. (Ill.) 247.

The "capital stock" of a corporation liable to taxation under N. Y. Laws 1857, chap. 456, § 8, is the actual capital owned by the corporation and not the shares of stock. (N. Y.) 762.

An elaborate discussion of the question of the exemption of church property from street assessments is presented in a case which decides that no such exemption is implied by an express exemption from taxation. (Ga.) 852.

The tax on that part of a telegraph line in any town is to be assessed, under N. Y. Laws, not according to its value as part of a line in operation, but according to the actual value of the property actually in the town. (N. Y.) 251.

Personal property of a non-resident invested or habitually kept within the State is subject to collateral inheritance tax under N. Y. Laws 1887. (N. Y.) 401.

A certificate by the proper officer that there are no unpaid taxes on certain lands is conclusive against the public in favor of one who purchases in reliance thereon. (Pa.) 751.

The power of the municipal corporations to tax a bridge across a navigable river in Arkansas extends only to that part which is above high-water mark, although one half of the bridge is within the county in which the corporation is situated. (Ark.) 487.

Eminent Domain.

There is no taking of property within the constitutional provision as to compensation in the case of damage to rice fields by a dam made in harbor improvements, which raises the low-water level in a navigable river, and destroys the drainage of the fields, and increases their liability to overflow in time of freshets. (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 678.

A railroad is located so as to exclude appropriation of the land by another road when the company has made a definite location, but not merely by staking out the line. (Pa.) 220.

A telegraph line in a street is held in Mississippi to be such an additional burden that the abutting owners are entitled to compensation, even if they do not own the fee. (Miss.) 864.

Municipal Matters.

An ordinance prohibiting second-hand clothing to be brought into or offered for sale within a town without first proving that it did not come from a place where contagion or infection is or has been prevailing, is unreasonable and void in the absence of any epidemic or other apparent necessity therefor. (Miss.) 528.

The validity of an ordinance establishing fire limits is upheld by a decision which declares it not unreasonable because the power is reserved to grant special permits for wooden buildings within such limits. (Wash.) 150.

A city owning the fee of streets in trust for the public can maintain trespass for the taking of coal beneath the surface, although the surface of the streets is not injured, and recover the full value of the coal. (Ill.) 826.

A public pump in a city street maintained by city authorities is not a nuisance to an abutting lotowner, and a well abandoned by a former owner of the land may be fitted up for public use without consent of the abutting owner. (Ind.) 259.

The revocation of licenses by the mayor of a city without notice to the licensee is not so unreasonable or oppressive as to make ordinances giving him that power invalid. (R. I.) 57.

A privilege by a town to a private person to place weighing scales in a street is authorized by Iowa Code, § 456, and after he has incurred expenses on the faith of it, it cannot be revoked unless the public interest requires it. (Iowa) 115.

Courts.

An action arising under the Interstate Commerce Act is held by the Louisiana Supreme Court not to be within the jurisdiction of state courts. (La.) 725.

Membership in a state bar association, which may be liable for the costs of a proceeding to disbar an attorney, does not disqualify a judge to sit therein. (Ala.) 184.

Amicus Curia.

An interesting case involving the rights and duties of an attorney as amicus curia holds that he may and should move to dismiss a suit if he knows it to be fictitious. (Nev.) 815.

Officers.

That the rule as to officers de facto does not apply to a mere usurper is illustrated by a decision holding an election void when held by a mere usurper of the office of registrar. (N. C.) 202.

A citizen of the State may be eligible to a county office, although he has moved into the county so recently that he cannot vote. (Tex.) 364.

Elections.

Votes may be given for the same man as a candidate for two incompatible offices. (Ill.) 125.

The decision of a tie vote by lot is not a violation of the constitutional provision that elections shall be by ballot. (Ind.) 285.

The prohibition by Connecticut Election Laws of words other than those expressly permitted on ballots does not make the ballot void by the use of the word "for" before the name of the office to be filled, but does make it void by the addition of other words to the legal name of the office, or by addition of the name of a candidate for an office not then to be filled at that election. (Conn.) 551.

This case also holds, in substance, that a citizens' party may be formed for the purpose of a single town meeting without any steps to perpetuate itself. Id.

A candidate independently nominated is entitled, under the Maryland Election Laws, to a place on the official ballot in addition to that among the group of candidates of a political party which has also nominated him in convention. (Md.) 586.

The word "canvass" in the South Dakota statutes, within twenty days after which notice of a contest of election must be given, includes the decision of a tie vote by lot, as provided by statute. (S. Dak.) 705.

The question whether provisions of a statute are directory or mandatory is raised in a case holding that a provision that the "clerk of the court shall cite" the judge of another district in certain cases is merely directory and that a citation by the judge with the assent of the clerk is sufficient. (Conn.) 358.

The maxim of ejusdem generis is discussed in a case holding that the words "all other officers," following an enumeration of county, township and precinct officers, includes officers of school districts. (Ill.) 125.

A dummy railroad operated by steam is held by an Alabama decision to be a railroad within the meaning of statutes regarding the operation of railroads. (Ala.) 880.

A person selling and delivering goods from house to house being included in the description of a "peddler" in a Legislative Act is not taken out of it by the fact that he is paid only by a salary. (D. C.) 624.

The term "month" in a statute is held by a Florida decision reviewing numerous decisions to mean calendar, not lunar, month. (Fla.) 770.

A statute applying to a certain class of counties created by the Constitution is not repealed by a general statute without negative words. (Pa.) 192.

I. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Construction and Effect of Contracts.

That time is not of the essence of a contract unless made so by express agreement, or the nature of the contract or of the circumstances under which it is made, is reaffirmed and illustrated by an Oregon decision. (Or.) 289.

Support of an incompetent person, which is by a declaration in trust made a charge on a farm, may be required to be furnished elsewhere than on the farm, where there is nothing in the declaration of trust to limit it to that place. (N. Y.) 667.

A contract to leave all one's property at death to an adopted child will not prevent him from transferring it without an attempt to defraud the child. (Ind.) 120.

A corporation is liable for money loaned to it although on the security of the note of individuals only; the test is whether the note was the consideration or only a security for the money. (Pa.) 223.

A contract is invalidated by the subsequent enactment of police regulations which render its performance illegal as to one of the parties. (Ind.) 652.

Signature.

A cross-mark alone opposite a seal may constitute a sufficient signature to a deed when placed under a clause containing the grantor's name and saying that he signed his name and affixed his seal.

The letters "D. S. C." may also constitute a sufficient signature by a witness to the deed whose name was Solomon Davis. Id.

Delivery.

Delivery by a mortgagor, a few hours before killing himself, of a mortgage for record at his own expense, is a good delivery to the mortgagee, although the latter has no knowledge of it until after the mortgagor's death. (Minn.) 171.

Consideration; Public Policy.

A minor's abstinence from intoxicating liquors, etc., is a good consideration for a promise by his uncle to pay him money. (N. Y.) 463.

The establishment of a new butter store is no consideration for an agreement of grocers to buy no butter from the makers for two years, and such an agreement is void as tending to create a monopoly. (Iowa) 428.

A purchase of stock by a broker for a customer, who puts up a margin, is a sale of stock on margin within the prohibition of the California Constitution. (Cal.) 511.

An agreement to prevent competition in the manufacture of fish glue under a patent making an article of great value out of one nearly worthless is not against public policy. (Mass.) 563.

Statute of Frauds.

A writing may constitute a sufficient memorandum under the Statute of Frauds, although it is made subject to the terms of another not yet in existence where the latter is subsequently procured in writing. (Mass.) 561.

Entry under a parol agreement for a written lease on certain conditions creates only a 12 L. R. A.

tenancy at will until a written agreement is made. (N. M.) 67.

A promise by the owner of a building to pay for work partly finished, made to induce its completion, where the principal contractor for whom the work was begun had made default in payment, is an original and not a collateral contract. (Ind.) 502.

Assignment.

The rule that a contract for service involving personal skill cannot be assigned applies to a lawyer's contract for an option to purchase lands in consideration of the use of his skill in removing clouds on the title. (Ill.) 496.

Rescission.

A formal re-entry by a lessor, who has remained in actual possession of the premises, is not necessary in order to terminate an oil and gas lease, and his election to forfeit it is a constructional entry. (Pa.) 290.

A purchaser is not entitled to a return of money paid or of unpaid purchase-money notes on the vendor's retaking possession of the property for default in payment of an installment, where the contract gives him a right to do so and reserves title until all is paid. (Mich.) 446.

False statements as to the market value of an article, made to a dealer therein to induce a purchase, does not justify a rescission, at least where it is clear that he did not believe them. (Mass.) 831.

Sales.

A conditional sale valid where it is made, by which the title is retained until the purchase money is paid, may be upheld against an innocent purchaser from the original vendee in another State to which the property is taken without payment, although by the laws of the former State the conditional sale would be held invalid as to a bona fide purchaser because not recorded. (Ala.) 700.

Acceptance, after inspection or fair opportunity to inspect it, of wheat furnished under a contract for wheat of a certain grade, precludes the buyer from denying that the contract is satisfied. (Ky.) 899.

Warranty.

A warranty of the soundness of horses is made by a bill of sale stating that they are sound and kind. (Vt.) 693.

Bailment.

Riding a hired horse a few miles beyond the point to which he was hired to go will not make the hirer liable for loss of the horse, where, after returning from the extra trip, he fell on the homeward road and died a day or two afterwards, unless the extra ride caused or materially contributed to this result. (Ga.) 397.

Innkeepers.

A check for a valise given by a porter without authority to a transient guest on his departure is not sufficient to make the innkeeper liable for it. (Ala.) 883.

Carriers.

A passenger is chargeable with notice of the stipulations of a ticket for a voyage which plainly purports to be a contract, although he did not read them. (Mass.) 840.

An Oregon case extensively reviews the right of a passenger to damages for forcible expulsion from a train where he refuses to pay fare and his ticket does not on its face entitle him to passage, although he has paid for it supposing he could ride on it. The case holds that he should leave the train quietly and seek a proper remedy for damages or else pay his fare. (Or.) 828.

A contract exempting a carrier from liability, valid where it was made, will be upheld by the courts of a State in which such contracts are held void as against public policy. (Mass.) 840.

A stipulation fairly and voluntarily entered into, limiting the amount of recovery for loss of goods shipped where their value is not specified, is valid even if the loss is due to slight or ordinary negligence. (Kan.) 799.

Stage property, paraphernalia, etc., are not baggage for which a carrier is liable as an insurer unless accepted as such by the carrier. (Or.) 818.

That joint through rates for transportation of freight may be compelled by statute is decided in Iowa. The decision also holds that carriers may be compelled to send carload lots to destination without unloading, unless at the carriers' expense, and that the transfer of less quantities to other cars must be a cost which is to be made a part of the through rate. (Iowa) 486.

Insurance.

The option of the insurer to refund the premiums or pay the policy according to the equities of the case, where the insured died by his own hand while insane, is not waived by failure to exercise it within the sixty days after proofs of loss allowed for payment if it is made within a reasonable time. (Wis.) 690.

Knowledge of an insurance agent as to the deafness of the insured constitutes a waiver of the objection that such deafness is a bodily infirmity contrary to a representation in his application. (N. C.) 815.

A promise to pay to the wife of the person insured a sum of money upon his death for permission to take out the insurance is void where the payee has no insurable interest in the life. (N. C.) 409.

Life insurance payable to the wife of the insured or in case of her death to his children vests in her if she survives him, although she dies before obtaining it, and her estate therein will not go to his children. (Colo.) 209.

Bills and Notes.

A note payable to a certain person "et al., or order," is not negotiable. (Iowa) 488.

A promissory note, although non-negotiable, need not express any consideration. (N. Y.) 845.

That the materiality of an alteration of a note does not depend upon the fact that it is a detriment to the party claiming to be released thereby, is shown by a decision that adding "& Co." to the name of the maker of a note is a material alteration as to an indorser. (Ala.) 140.

Signature of a payee to an assignment written out on the back of a note makes him liable as an ordinary indorser. (Minn.) 870.

An indorser of a forged bill is liable to the indorsee on its dishonor without proof of demand or notice. (Utah) 484.

The time for notice of dishonor of a note which is indorsed when overdue is the same as in case of notes indorsed before maturity, although the same diligence is not necessary in respect to demand. (Tenn.) 727.

An assignment of a note carries a guaranty not referred to, but which is all that gives the note value. (Conn.) 870.

An assignee of a mortgage and note secured thereby as collateral security, to whom a forged copy of the note is delivered with the mortgage, has a good title to the note as against one to whom the assignor after maturity transfers the genuine note. (Ohio) 41.

Collateral security for a note or any other liability of the maker does not constitute a special pledge or give an indorser any claim to preference in the application of the proceeds. (Mass.) 181.

Banks.

Certification of a check by a bank on the drawee's application releases the drawer. (Ill.) 492.

A check given by an insolvent to his creditor is held worthless after the insolvent's death if not previously presented or certified, although by the law of the State checks are regarded as assignments. (La.) 802.

A case of the highest importance to banks and depositors, decided by the New York Court of Appeals in almost exact conflict with the already famous Vagliano v. Bank of England Case, decides that a depositor without negligence is not prejudiced by the fact that the bank has paid money on checks with indorsements of the payees' names forged by his clerk, who stole the checks; that the fact that the checks were payable to a fictitious person does not make them payable to bearer under the New York statute, where the maker supposed the payee to be a real person. (N. Y.) 791.

Interest.

A good illustration of the law as to interest on contracts between citizens of different States is presented by a decision that notes and a deed of trust signed and dated in Texas, but delivered by an agent in New York, may bear interest according to the law of Texas. (Tex.) 98.

Money.

Spanish milled dollars constitute a good tender for ground rent reserved in such dollars at a time when they were legal tender, although they have been demonetized by Act of Congress and Spain has ceased to coin them. (Pa.) 219.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

See also infra, VI., Electricity.

The promotion of the cause of temperance is too vague a description of the objects of a corporation to bring its funds within the control of equity as a public charity and prevent division thereof among the members. (Cal.) 117.

(DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY—FIDUCIARIES AND REPRESENTATIVES.)

The state board of agriculture is held in Indiana to be a private corporation, although no shares of stock are issued. (Ind.) 604.

The State only can question the right of foreign corporations to hold lands in excess of the amount limited by statute. (Ga.) 529.

The deed of a corporation may be lawfully acknowledged by a representative having authority to execute it. (N. Y.) 588.

The doctrine that a corporation is estopped to deny the validity of a contract under which it has received benefits on the ground that it was not made in conformity to statutory requirements is upheld in the case of a water-works company which had issued bonds. (C. W. D. Pa.) 168.

Directors.

Directors are personally liable for a contract made by them before they have any authority to create a corporate obligation. (Ohio) 346.

Stockholders.

The right of pledgors and pledgees of corporate stock and of the holders of a majority of the stock in respect to voting for directors is extensively discussed in a case from North Dakota. (N. Dak.) 781.

The rights of a bona fide purchaser of stock issued by a corporation having legal authority to do so, in place of surrendered stock, are to be protected where he had no notice of any illegality in the surrender and cancellation of the original certificate. (Ind.) 498.

The doctrine that payment of subscriptions to a corporation, made in property, must be at its real value, is discussed and well illustrated by a case in which subscriptions amounting to $200,000 were paid by $5,000 worth of property. (Ala.) 307.

The liability of stockholders as partners, where they have formed a foreign corporation solely because they could not organize a corporation under the laws of their own State, is asserted by a decision of the Texas Court of Appeals. (Tex.) 866.

Receiver.

The powers of a receiver of an insolvent corporation are held not to extend to the enforcement of claims against stockholders which creditors of the company might enforce, but as to which the corporation is estopped. (Ill.) 828.

Church.

A church site and edifices may be sold to pay the salary of the pastor. (Ga.) 155.

Partnership.

The right of a surviving partner to borrow money in good faith to pay the debts of the firm is upheld as a valid claim on the firm assets under an assignment for creditors, although the firm was in fact insolvent at the time of the loan. (N. Y.) 146.

The right of individual creditors to be paid out of the separate property of a partner in preference to firm creditors is discussed and upheld on a review of the authorities. (Mo.) 254.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

Statutory prohibition to remarry within a certain time has no force out of the State in which the decree of divorce is granted. (Me.) 862.

Connivance of a husband in his wife's adultery is not shown, where he already suspects her to be guilty, by merely suffering her in a single instance to avail herself of an opportunity thereof for which she has already arranged without his knowledge, even though he purposely refrains from warning her because he hopes to obtain evidence which will entitle him to a divorce. (Mass.) 524.

The right to alimony on decreeing the nullity of a void marriage cannot be conferred by a statute passed after such marriage took place. (W. Va.) 50.

The right to dower does not exist in favor of the wife on annulment of a marriage which was contracted in good faith, because the husband had a former wife living, although she had not been heard from in five years before the second marriage, and this was therefore valid, under New York laws, until its nullity was proclaimed by a court. (N. Y.) 859.

Disaffirmance of deeds by infants is discussed in a case which holds that any unequivocally expressed intention to disaffirm after coming of age is sufficient; but where the infant is the grantee, this does not reinvest title without reconveyance. (Ala.) 186.

Insane delusions are discussed in a case which defines them as conceptions that originate spontaneously without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis, and which holds that they do not include a belief or aversion, formed on an apparent cause, however insufficient. (Or.) 161.

The discharge of a person from an insane asylum is held to be in itself a restoration to his capacity to sue, under California statutes. (Cal.) 104.

V. FIDUCIARIES AND REPRESENTATIVES.

A letter acknowledging indebtedness and saying that the money is in bank and to be considered on interest, not to be interfered with by the writer until the other is capable of taking care of it, creates a trust. (N. Y.) 463.

The right to support out of the net rents of a farm, or interest on its price if sold, which is given by a declaration of trust made by a grantee, is held to be not limited to support on 12 L. R. A.

the farm, and the trustee is held to have a duty of actual supervision and a responsibility which is not escaped by transferring the land charged with the support. (N. Y.) 667.

A person can recover back money paid to a broker as commissions on discovering that he was acting as agent for the other party also. (Pa.) 895.

A foreign executor who takes out ancillary letters is subject to suit even by a non-resident creditor. (N. Y.) 237.

Executors de son tort are not recognized by the laws of Missouri, as the statutory system of administration is inconsistent with the common law in that regard. (Mo.) 187.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES; NUISANCES.

Conversion.

Wrenching machinery from a mill against the protest of a co-tenant, and carrying it away, may constitute conversion. (N. C.) 261.

Buildings.

Permitting a stairway carpet with holes in it to remain on the stairs of a tenement house with notice of its condition renders the owner liable for injuries to a tenant from a fall caused by catching her foot in one of the holes. (N. Y.) 843.

A contractor is not liable to a stranger to the contract for injuries caused by defects in a building which has been completed and accepted by the owner. (Pa.) 322.

A presumption of negligence from the fact of an accident arises in the case of the fall of a heavy sign by its own weight. (Ark.) 189.

In Public Service.

Negligence in blasting for a schoolhouse is within the rule that negligent or defective performance of public service creates no liability. (Mass.) 160.

Infants.

A child of tender years may be chargeable with the consequences of his own negligence when injured while trespassing. (Pa.) 216.

Railroad Injuries.

It is negligence to run a railway train without a cow-catcher on the engine. (Ala.) 108.

Riding on the platform of a street-car when there is room inside is not negligence per se. (Mich.) 129.

It is not negligence as matter of law for a person who has stepped off from a railroad track, to allow a train to pass, to step on again without looking out for the rear section of the train, which was broken off and following it some distance away. (Tenn.) 184.

An attempt to board a moving train is negligence as matter of law if made by one in a safe position, and without necessity, where a misstep would involve serious consequences. (N. Y.) 429.

The duty of a railroad company to have lookouts on the front of a train is held to apply to the rear section of a train which is broken in two, if there were employes upon it who could have acted as lookouts. (Tenn.) 184.

A railroad company contracting to furnish cars for stone at a quarry, and charged with the duty of selecting them, is liable to a servant of the quarryman for failure to use ordinary care to select safe cars, although it would not be liable to him for breach of duty arising purely under the contract. (Mo.) 746.

Injury by Servant.

A street-railway company is liable for its driver's abuse of a passenger and threatening to arrest him for giving him counterfeit money, but not for an arrest which the driver causes to be made without any instructions to do so. (La.) 337.

Injury to Servants.

Proper rules for the conduct of his business must be furnished by a master in order to prevent liability to a servant for negligence of fellow servants. (N. Y.) 454.

The duty of a master to warn or instruct his servants as to danger is discussed in a case which holds that no warning is necessary of the obvious danger from molten iron which will flow into a trench where men are working if a wall is broken through, but is necessary as to the danger from the flying of the metal when the "boil" is punctured and the shell broken. (Ala.) 232.

A rule, not expressly assented to by an employe, that he must take all risks, and that remaining in the service is an acceptance of the rule, does not bind him. (Ga.) 842.

The assumption of known risks applies to the case of a brakeman who is injured by a low bridge over a railroad track, of which he had knowledge. (W. Va.) 297.

A panic-stricken employe is not relieved from the duty of diligence to escape from danger, although less diligence may be required of him. (Ala.) 232.

A very vigorous discussion of the true rule of liability for negligence of fellow servants is presented in a North Dakota case, which decides that the character of the work in which the negligence occurred is the test, and not the relative rank of the servants. (N. Dak.) 97.

Failure of a railroad company to furnish transportation to a place where food and shelter can be procured to a car repairer, sent out to repair a car, on account of which he is compelled to walk nine miles in the night in cold and dangerous weather in order to find shelter, renders the company liable for injuries thereby sustained, and is the proximate cause of such injuries. (Minn.) 257.

Proximate Cause.

See also last point, supra.

The question of proximate cause is again illustrated in a case where the negligence which caused a collision at one crossing is held the cause of injury at a second crossing. (Pa.) 268.

The rule that a negligent act or omission will not constitute negligence if it was merely a condition and not a proximate cause of the injury is applied to the case of a servant who was injured by a falling wall of which he had no warning, while he was disregarding a warning of another danger. (Conn.) 279.

Injury on Highway or Bridge.

A town is not relieved from liability for injury to a traveler by the fact that the innocent act of another traveler co-operated with a defect in the highway in producing the injury. (Mass.) 249.

A telegraph wire hanging so low across a highway as to cause an injury will render a town liable if it had notice or ought to have had notice of the defect. (Minn.) 249.

The narrowness of a bridge and the insufficiency of its railings are not the proximate cause of an injury to one whose cutter was dragged off the bridge by his horse, which fell and broke the railing in consequence of disease or choking by the harness. (Iowa) 482.

Act of God.

An injury caused by a March wind not stronger than might be expected at that season is not the act of God. (Ark.) 189.

Nuisances.

The history and nature of nuisances and the remedies therefor are discussed in a very clear opinion in a West Virginia case concerning an alleged nuisance of the noise of a manufactory. (W. Va.) 58.

Deposits of coal slack, etc., by a mining company where they are washed down by a stream to the injury of others make the company liable for the damages, if the results could have been anticipated by persons of ordinary intelligence and prudence. (Ohio) 577.

A public pump in a street maintained by a city is held not to be a nuisance to an abutting owner where the well had been abandoned by a former owner and fitted again for use by the city. (Ind.) 259.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS; GIFTS; WILLS.

Property.

The right to transmit property by inheritance is "property" within the meaning of a constitutional provision as to depriving of property; but the next of kin of a living person have no "property" in his estate within the meaning of such a provision. (Tenn.) 70.

Loss.

The rule as to repairs, rather than that as to building contracts, governs on the destruction by fire of a building nearly completed, for which the contractor was to furnish part only of the labor and materials. (Mass.) 571.

The loss by fire of a house in possession of a vendee under a defective deed falls upon him where he is the equitable owner of the premises. (Wis.) 178.

The question who must bear the loss in case of the neglect of an officer to record a deed delivered for record is decided against the grantee as between him and a bona fide purchaser. (Wash.) 884.

Transfer of Possession.

On an exchange by husband and wife of his wagon for her sleigh, which were both kept before and after in a barn leased by him, there is no such change of possession as will uphold her title to the wagon against the husband's creditors. (Vt.) 600.

Heirs.

A widow is an heir of her husband within the meaning of that term in a will to the extent of $5,000 up to which she is given an estate in fee by the Massachusetts Statute, but not as to the estate which she has the option of taking in lieu of dower. (Mass.) 721.

The question, "who are the heirs-at-law" of a person within the meaning of a Massachusetts will which gives them an estate in a certain event, if he is not then living, is to be determined by the law of Massachusetts, although the person named is domiciled in another State. Id.

The statutory right of children not named in a will to share as in case of intestacy is not affected by a power of sale contained in the will. (Cal.) 46.

The estate of an heir-at-law in property subject to sale under a power is not an actual estate until the power is exercised, which is alienable, devisable and descendible, or is determined by sale under the power. (N. J.) 62.

Electricity.

A question of very great importance at the present time is discussed in two important 12 L. R. A.

opinions, each of which decides that no vested rights of a telephone company are interfered with by the introduction of an electric railway the use of which interferes with the ground circuit of the telephone system. (Ohio) 534; (C. C. M. D. Tenn.) 544.

Ice.

A recent opinion as to the right to cut ice on a meandered unnavigable stream holds that the same rights exist in the ice that exist in the water, and that any person who can get access to it without repossessing on the land of riparian owners may cut the ice and acquire property therein. (Iowa) 588.

Trees.

The rights of adjoining owners to trees on the boundary line are those of tenants in common, and one may enjoin the other from cutting them down. (Iowa) 484.

Private Way.

A fence may be made along a statutory private road if necessary to its reasonable enjoyment, as for driving cattle, especially where the owner of the soil has land on one side only. (Mich.) 601.

Docks and Wharves.

The right to a dock between low-water mark and the channel of a river may be reserved on conveyance of the adjacent land, under a statute giving owners the right to construct such docks below low-water mark. (Mass.) 617.

A decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington, extensively reviewing the authorities, holds that a riparian proprietor on the shore of the sea or its arms has no right, as against the State or its grantees, to extend wharves in front of his land below high-water mark. (Wash.) 632.

Patents.

The patentability of a combination of old elements is clearly discussed in a case deciding that the result produced by the combination must be due to their co-operative action; and that an element which does not affect the action of all the others destroys the patentability of the combination, making it a mere aggregation. (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 107.

Tenancy.

Title to the hay, oats, and straw is not reserved to the owner of a farm as against attaching creditors of a tenant, under a lease by which the tenant agrees to raise enough stuff to feed the stock of the place, or, if he fails to do so, buy what may be necessary. (N. Y.) 848.

The right of a person under a lease, giving him the exclusive right to quarry stone for a term of years, is merely an incorporeal hereditament and not an estate in the land; and such lease gives him no right to recover as owner for stone quarried and taken away by trespassers. (N. Y.) 60.

Life Tenant.

A life tenant cannot make a valid agreement for the removal of buildings erected on the land if they are not within any of the exceptions to the rule against removal of fixtures. (Ark.) 97.

Liens; Judgments.

The doctrine of exemption of a public corporation from mechanics' liens in Pennsylvania applies to a water company which is bound to furnish water at reasonable rates and after twenty years to transfer its works to a municipality if required at a certain amount above cost, and which is protected from competition until it can pay a certain dividend. (Pa.) 324.

Mechanics' liens on a building erected on land purchased under a contract are superior to the vendors' lien. (Neb.) 38.

One who has attached real estate, but has not obtained judgment, is a "creditor having a lien" within the meaning of the Minnesota Statute relating to redemption of land. (Minn.) 741.

The technical common-law rule that a judgment lien did not attach to a mere equity is not in force in Minnesota, although not abrogated by statute as all reasons for the old law have ceased to exist. Id.

A purchaser of land from Daniel J. Murphy is not charged with notice of a judgment docketed against Daniel Murphy. (Pa.) 58.

Homestead.

In a hotel which is exempt as a family homestead rooms used for hotel purposes, but which cannot be reached without going through rooms used by the family, are part of the homestead. (Iowa) 477.

A tenant in common has no homestead right in the premises in Tennessee. (Tenn.) 519.

Land held by husband and wife as tenants by entireties is subject to the Tennessee Homestead Laws, making an exemption of real estate belonging to the head of a family to the amount of $1,000. (Tenn.) 514.

Powers.

No limitation of time is imposed upon a power in the nature of a trust not limited in terms, unless the rule against perpetuities is involved or the power is controlled by an inherent quality in the nature of the trust or in the object for which the power was granted. (N. J.) 62.

Trust.

The rights of creditors to income given by a trust in favor of their debtor, free from his creditors, with another disposition provided the court should hold it subject to his debts, extend only to income accrued before such decision. (Ky.) 87.

A deed in trust for a married woman and her children, she having none at the time, gives her the whole estate. (Ga.) 157.

Gift.

A gift of a note without delivery cannot be made even by a sealed instrument, at least where this shows an intent merely to give the money when the note was collected. (Ind.) 506.

Wills.

The lack of testatrix's signature at the end of an instrument written by her own hand and containing her own name at the beginning is not supplied by her statement that the instrument is her will and a request to a subscribing witness to sign it. (N. Y.) 452. See also supra, II., Signature.

A widow's election to take against the will of her husband is equivalent to her death as respects the distribution of the estate under the will, and any loss to beneficiaries by reason thereof must come out of the residuary legacy alone, if there is enough left to pay the specific legacies. (Pa.) 227.

A bequest of personality to a "community" in a foreign country is valid if it has capacity to take by the laws of that country. (N. Y.) 620.

Legal incapacity of a legatee to perform a condition on which the gift is made will prevent it from taking effect, although the time for performance was subsequent thereto. (Mass.) 110.

The legal incapacity of a town to support a clergyman entirely defeats a bequest to be made "strictly on this condition," that it shall support him. Id.

A bequest for an art institute when one worthy of the city is founded by contribution of citizens is not void for indefiniteness, and is charitable; nor is it void for remoteness where the income is to be given annually in the meantime in prizes for the best works of art produced by artists of the State. (R. I.) 414.

Silence of the legatee, who had said she was to be paid $10,000 on the reply of the testatrix that $3,000 of it had been paid, is not an admission of such payment. (Mass.) 566.

VII. CIVIL REMEDIES, RULES AND PRINCIPLES.

Law and Equity.

The distinction between law and equity jurisdiction in federal courts is illustrated by a decision that a remedy in an action at law to enforce a specific lien upon property conveyed to secure a note cannot be enforced in a federal court. (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 681.

Abstract Questions.

The refusal of a court to decide abstract questions is well illustrated in a case where 12 L. R. A.

the court refused to decide as to the legality of a proposed contract between plaintiff and defendant in an action for trespass which they presented by a stipulation as a basis for a judgment in the case. (Ill.) 326.

For Breach of Statutory Duty.

An action of tort will lie for a railroad company's breach of its statutory duty to stop at a station for a passenger. (N. C.) 113.

Malicious Prosecution.

The finding of an examining magistrate is only prima facie evidence of probable cause in an action for malicious prosecution. (Kan.) 760.

The rule that a malicious prosecution must have terminated before a suit for damages will lie does not apply where the complaint is not of the action but of an excessive attachment of goods, not for security but to injure the defendant. (Mass.) 288.

Recovering Back Money Paid.

The right to recover back money paid under a mistake of law is upheld by a Connecticut decision in the case of an overpayment by an administrator to a creditor, both mistakenly supposing the estate to be solvent. (Conn.) 285.

Money paid to redeem from a tax sale may be recovered back where the sale was void because of a double assessment. (Pa.) 688.

Reformation of Deed.

The fact that a grantor intended to convey only his own land, which he did convey as bounded by one of an adjoining owner, will not prevent reformation of the deed for mutual mistake of fact where both parties supposed that the land staked and pointed out all belonged to him, although it did not; and damages for breach of covenant may be had on the deed as reformed. (Conn.) 273.

Specific Performance.

Specific performance will be granted to the seller of stock on the ground of mutuality of right and remedy, where the purchaser would be entitled to such relief if he asked it. (W. Va.) 776.

An option for shares of stock may be specifically enforced if they have a unique and special value to the purchaser. Id.

Exemption; Custody of Law.

A "teamster or other laborer" who "habitually earns his living" with a horse or team, within the meaning of an Exemption Law, includes one who sells oil, delivering it by a tank wagon usually driven by his boy, although he makes a few sales and delivers the oil at the room where it is stored. (Iowa) 476.

Funds set apart by an assessment society to be paid to the families of members are exempt, under Minnesota Statutes, from seizure by legal process for debts due from members of the family of a deceased member or from the society itself. (Minn.) 273.

Money sued for is not in the custody of the law so as to be beyond the reach of garnishment, where both suits are in the same jurisdiction. (R. I.) 801.

A distributee's share of money in the hands of a clerk of court is subject to garnishment after final decree and order of distribution. (Cal.) 508.

Remedy of Landlord.

A landlord's lien on crops for rent under Ill. Rev. Stat., chap. 80, can give him no right to maintain a personal action for damages against a bona fide purchaser from the tenant, although he may follow the goods and distrain for his rent. (Ill.) 605.

Injunction.

The rule that an injunction will not lie to prevent a libel does not apply to the circulation of posters, etc., in carrying out a boycott, but the boycott will be enjoined. (C. C. S. D. Ohio) 198.

Money paid in condemnation proceedings may be kept by injunction while it is under the control of the court and applied on a mortgage debt where the mortgagee has been omitted by mistake from the condemnation proceedings. (Ill.) 84.

Mandamus.

Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a railroad company to build a farm crossing. (Wis.) 180.

Writ of Possession.

The common-law rule requiring a writ of possession in aid of a judgment in ejectment to be issued within a year and a day is not in force in Illinois, where execution on judgments can be had at any time within seven years. (Ill.) 81.

Limitation.

An application of a payment, if made to a debt already barred, will not remove the bar as to the balance, but if made to one not barred will interrupt the running of the Statute. (Me.) 712.

Preferences by Confessing Judgment.

Confessions of judgment made in contemplation of a general assignment for creditors are held in New York in harmony with most decisions in other jurisdictions to be within the Statute governing preferences in general assignments. (N. Y.) 808.

Judgment on Penal Bond.

An extended discussion of the rule as to judgment on a penal bond is presented in a case deciding that where the bond is for a continuing liability, judgment should be for the penalty, with an assessment of damages so far as they have accrued, leaving future damages to be recovered by after process of scire facias. (Me.) 90.

Damages.

The price to be paid to a volunteer for enduring suffering caused by a personal injury cannot be regarded as the standard in determining the amount of damages in an action for such injury. (Pa.) 698.

Set-Off.

Loss caused by unskillful work may be set off against a claim for wages, and the set-off is not limited to the particular days during which the damage was done. (Pa.) 831.

Question for Jury.

The right of the jury to determine the trade meaning of words does not extend to the determination whether such terms in a contract relating to that business were used in that meaning. (S. C.) 875.

View of Jury.

The power of a court at common law to permit a view by the jury of premises in a suit for damages to them is exhaustively discussed in a case which decided in favor of that power. (Ill.) 689.

Presumptions.

The presumption in favor of the validity of a judgment does not extend to a case of personal service on a defendant, who is a non-resident, where the proof does not show whether or not the service was made within the State. (Mass.) 574.

The presumption of continuance applies to a foreign law which has been proved by a governmental publication. (N. Y.) 620.

Evidence.

The opinion of an expert may be given on the question whether the word in the date of a written instrument is "Jany" or "July." (N. Y.) 456.

The admissibility of opinions of witnesses is discussed in a case in which opinions as to the danger of a broad step or raised part of a station platform were excluded. (Pa.) 298.

Experienced advertisers and distributors of samples are competent to testify whether or not a certain number of samples is a reasonable number to furnish an agent in one year for distribution. (Pa.) 398.

The competency of declarations of a man that he is married and has a son is denied so far as it depends on the rule as to res gesta, where he never lived with the alleged wife or had anything to do with the son, but are held admissible to show the legitimacy of the son as hearsay in case of pedigree. (N. Y.) 836.

In the same case a judgment for plaintiff in an action for seduction of his daughter is held inadmissible against her son in an action to enforce his rights as heir of the judgment defendant. Id.

And the mother in such a case is held not to have "any interest in the event" which makes her incompetent to testify to the fact of the marriage. Id.

Declarations of voters made before or after election, and not as part of the res gesta, are not admissible in an election contest to show their disqualification. (Ark.) 862.

A convincing opinion in a Massachusetts case decides that evidence is not admissible to show subsequent precautions against other accidents as an admission of negligence at the time of an accident. (Mass.) 554.

A note with nothing on its face to show any intent to bind anyone but the signer cannot be shown by parol to have been given by him as president of a corporation. (Mo.) 714.

Books of a corporation are not evidence against a director or stockholder to prove an account against him in an action on behalf of the corporation. (N. Y.) 478.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

One who holds intoxicating liquors for members of a club as tenants in common is liable for making a sale without license, when he furnishes the drinks to members on payment of the cost price. (N. C.) 412.

Authority from parent or guardian to sell intoxicating liquors to a minor, under Georgia Statutes, must be special for each occasion, and a general permit without limitation as to time or quantity is void even as to a single sale. (Ga.) 488.

A gift enterprise includes a sale of coffee on each package of which is a slip concealing the name of some article of crockery, to which the buyer is entitled. (Md.) 89.

But if it does not involve the element of chance it cannot be prohibited by the Legislature, even though carried on by a merchant to secure custom. (Md.) 425.

An arrest for a misdemeanor cannot be made without warrant on the authority of a letter from a police officer of another State. (Mass.) 379.

The error of allowing a prosecuting attorney to comment on defendant's failure to give evidence of good character is not altered by the fact that the defendant's counsel had gone outside of the evidence in making statements as to his good character. (Ga.) 449.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

OPINIONS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ABORTION.

Conspiring to commit an abortion is not a felony at common law. Scott v. Eldridge (Mass.) 379

ACCRETIONS. See WATERS AND WATERCOURSES, 8.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The acknowledgment of a deed of a corporation aggregate may be made by a representative of the corporation who has authority to execute the deed, in the absence of any statute particularly relating to the acknowledgment or proof of such deeds. Hopper v. Lovejoy (N. J.) 583

ACTION OR SUIT.

1. An action of tort will lie for a railroad company's breach of its statutory duty to stop at a station for a passenger. Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (N. C.) 118

2. A creditor of a decedent cannot base a right of action against a third person on the latter's conversion of assets of the estate, in a State where the law does not recognize executors de son tort. Roselle v. Harmon (Mo.) 187

3. A claim for the reformation of a deed, and one for damages for breach of covenants of the deed as amended, may be joined in the same action, under Conn. Gen. Stat. § 877, providing that legal and equitable remedies may be enforced in one action. Butler v. Barnes (Conn.) 278

4. The rule that a malicious prosecution must have terminated before a suit for damages can be based thereon does not apply to a just cause of action, in respect to which the only grievance is that an excessive attachment of goods was made, not to secure the debt, but to injure the defendant. Zinn v. Rice (Mass.) 286

5. A city, having the legal title to its streets in trust for the public, can maintain trespass for the removal of coal underlying the streets and recover the full value of the coal, although no actual damage has been done to the surface of the streets. Union Coal Co. v. La Salle (Ill.) 826

6. An action commenced by collusion, without any real controversy, will be dismissed. Haley v. Eureka County Bank (Nev.) 815

7. A judgment by default and the assignment thereof will not prevent dismissal of the suit as collusive. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Action; effect of collusion. 815

ACT OF GOD.

An injury is not attributable to an act of God, but to neglect, where it is caused by the fall of a sign in a wind such as might be expected in the regular course of the seasons. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hopkins (Ark.) 189

ADVANCEMENTS.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Advancements; doctrine of; distinguished from gift; intention; effect on legacy. 566

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

A state board of agriculture, created a body corporate with perpetual succession, including as ex officio members the president of each county agricultural society, and which is in a sense an educational institution, required to hold an annual meeting and receive reports from county societies and make an annual report to the Legislature, its funds having been received for the most part from other sources than the State, is a private, and not a public corporation, although no shares of stock are issued. Downing v. Indiana State Board of Agri. (Ind.) 664

ALIENS.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Aliens; disabilities of; escheat of property. 539

ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS.

See also BILLS AND NOTES, 6; EVIDENCE, 6.

1. The indorser of a note before it was signed, who gave it to the maker to be signed, for the purpose of raising money for both of them, is not released as indorser by the fact that the maker changed his signature to that of his firm by adding "& Co.," since, so far as the indorser was concerned, he could have signed the firm name in the first place. Montgomery v. Crosthwait (Ala.) 140

2. A material alteration of a promissory note by any of the parties thereto discharges from liability all other parties not consenting to or authorizing the alteration, whether or not it is apparently or presumably to their benefit or detriment. Id.

8. Adding "& Co." to his name by the maker of a note is a material alteration of it, which will release the indorser if done without his consent or authority. Id.

4. The fact that the addition of "& Co." to the maker's name on a note is ineffectual to bind his partners will not prevent it from being a material alteration as to an indorser. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Alteration of instruments; ratification of altered or forged note. 140

AMICUS CURIE. See also MOTION.

An attorney as amicus curie may move to dismiss an action as collusive; and it is his duty to do so if he knows or has reason to believe that the action is fictitious. Haley v. Eureka County Bank (Nev.) 815

APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. A freehold is involved so as to give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Illinois of an appeal from an order overruling a motion to quash a writ of possession in aid of a judgment in ejectment. Bowser v. Chicago W. D. R. Co. (Ill.) 81

2. It will be presumed upon appeal that the court found against a counterclaim, if it omitted to set out any finding in regard to it and the evidence clearly justifies a finding against it. Wetzel v. Duffy (Wis.) 178

3. The certificate of the judge that a transcript contains all the evidence will be accepted as true against an objection that the evidence is not all included, in the absence of any specific reference to show that fact. Spencer v. Andrews (Iowa) 115

4. An order will be treated as a part of the record and legitimately before the court for examination on the rehearing of an appeal, if the case was submitted by both parties at the first hearing, upon the theory that the order was properly in the record. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Swigert (Ill.) 828

5. Error may be assigned upon an interlocutory order which is continued in force by the final decree, and involves and determines a matter of substantial right. Id.

6. An order for the payment of a dividend to creditors, made during the course of proceedings for the winding up of an insolvent insurance company, to which no objection was taken until a rehearing of an appeal from the final decree in the case had been granted, and upon which the receiver has acted and had his report confirmed,—will not be disturbed. Id.

7. The rule that the dissolving of an injunction is discretionary, and that the refusal of the court below to dissolve it will not be disturbed unless the discretion is abused, does not apply to cases involving questions of law arising upon the face of the pleading. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 486

8. An exception to the exclusion of a question L. R. A.

tion cannot be maintained where there is nothing to show what the answer would have been or what there was an offer to prove. Shinnors v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals (Mass.) 554

9. Neglect to make a finding not requested cannot be objected to on appeal, if the evidence is not sufficient to require it as matter of law. Wetzel v. Duffy (Wis.) 178

10. Findings that a judgment was confessed in contemplation of an assignment for creditors and in fraud of the statute governing such assignments, though classified among conclusions of law, will be given the same effect to uphold the judgment as if they were designated as findings of fact. Berger v. Varrelmann (N. Y.) 808

11. The right result of a case on its merits will not be disturbed because the record of a judgment referred to in the petition was not copied and annexed as an exhibit. Lyons v. Planters Loan & Sav. Bank (Ga.) 155

12. An instruction subject to criticism in the abstract is not prejudicial if it was correct when tested by the only evidence in the case to which it could relate. Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (Ala.) 232

13. Allowing the State's counsel to argue before the jury, after objection by the prisoner's counsel, that the defendant's character is bad because he had a right to prove his good character and has not done so, is an error which will require a reversal of a conviction. Benett v. State (Ga.) 449

14. A judgment will not be reversed for improperly allowing a former verdict to go to the jury with other papers, where it was not known or read by them until their own verdict was agreed upon. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Donlin (Ga.) 843

15. Permitting a paper to be read in evidence which was set out in the complaint, and thus made a part of the record in the cause, cannot be detrimental to the objecting party so as to constitute reversible error. Citizens Street R. Co. v. Robbins (Ind.) 498

16. An order for a new trial on plaintiff's motion, even if inadvertently granted as to one of the defendants, whose right to an undivided half of real property in dispute was admitted to be as the judgment determined it, must be reversed as to him. Lee v. Fletcher (Minn.) 171

17. A rehearing will not be granted in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted. Kellogg v. Cochran (Cal.) 104

18. A writ of possession which has been executed will not be quashed unless a writ of restitution should be granted, as the quashal would otherwise do no good. Bowser v. Chicago W. D. R. Co. (Ill.) 81

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Appeal; exceptions to exclusion of evidence; purpose and effect; when must be taken; must be specific. 534

ARREST.

An arrest for a misdemeanor cannot be made without warrant, on the authority of a letter from a police officer of another State. Scott v. Eldridge (Mass.) 879

NOTES AND BRIEFS

Arrest; legality; of fugitive. 879

ASSIGNMENT. See also BILLS AND NOTES, 18, 19.

A lawyer cannot make a valid assignment of a contract giving him an option as to certain lands in consideration of the use of his professional skill in removing clouds on the title, unless the contract has been fully performed on his part. Sloan v. Williams (Ill.) 496

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Assignment; of contracts for personal services. 496

ASSUMPSIT.

1. Money paid to a broker for effecting the sale of real estate in ignorance of the fact that he is also the agent of the purchaser may be recovered back, even if the sale is an advantageous one. Cannell v. Smith (Pa.) 295

2. An overpayment by an administrator to a creditor, in the mistaken belief that the estate is solvent, where the mistake is one of law or of fact, may be recovered back although the creditor received it in good faith believing that he was justly entitled thereto. Mansfield v. Lynch (Conn.) 285

3. Advancements to a contractor, made by the owner of a building, may be recovered for failure of consideration, on its destruction by fire before completion, although the contractor can set off his claim on an implied assumpsit for the value of what was already done, where he is discharged by the fire and entitled to such compensation because the contract was for part only of the labor and materials. Butler v. Byron (Mass.) 571

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Assumpsit; right to recover back overpayment by executor or administrator. 285

ATTORNEYS' FEES. See CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 6; COSTS AND FEES.

BAGGAGE. See CARRIERS, 9-13.

BAILMENT.

1. One who hires a horse to go to a certain point has no right, without the consent of the owner, to go with the horse beyond that point, unless forced to do so by circumstances which he cannot control. Farkas v. Powell (Ga.) 897.

2. Riding a hired horse a few miles beyond the point to which he was hired to go will not make the hirer liable for loss of the horse, where, after returning from the extra trip, he fell on the homeward road, and died a day or two afterwards, unless the extra ride caused or materially contributed to this result. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Bailment; letting of horse for hire. 897

BANKS. See also CHECKS, 1.

1. A depositor has the right to assume when checks are returned to him by the bank that it has ascertained the genuineness of indorsements thereon. Shipman v. Bank of the State of New York (N. Y.) 791

2. Payment of checks stolen from the depositor without negligence on his part, by his clerk, who forged the indorsements of the payees' names, constitutes no defense to the bank against an action by the depositor for its deposit, especially where the bank made no inquiry as to the genuineness of the indorsements, but relied upon the responsibility of the persons presenting the checks for payment. Id.

3. The fact that the forger of indorsements on checks has made good the amount to the payees constitutes no defense to the bank which has paid out money on the checks, in an action by the depositor on his deposit money founded upon the checks, where he has not profited by such payment. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Banks; relation to depositor or holder of check. 803

Effect of certification of check. 493

Relation to depositors; passbook as evidence of right to draw money; paying out customer's funds; loss by payment on forged signature. 791

BASTARDY. See JUDGMENT, 3.

BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES. See INSURANCE, 1, 2, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

BILLS AND NOTES. See also ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS, NOTES AND BRIEFS; CORPORATIONS, 5; DEBTOR AND CREDITOR; EVIDENCE, 39, 40.

1. A note payable to a certain person "et al., or order," is not negotiable, because of uncertainty as to the unnamed payees. This rule is not changed by Iowa Code, § 2085, making an instrument promising to pay money or property to another negotiable if such is the manifest intent of the maker. Gordon v. Anderson (Iowa) 488

2. A negotiable paper note made payable to a fictitious person and negotiated by the maker, which is given the same validity as against the maker and all persons having knowledge of the facts as if payable to bearer, by N. Y. Rev. Stat. 768, § 5, includes only paper made with knowledge that the payee is fictitious, and does not include paper made by one who supposes the payee to be a real person and which is fraudulently negotiated by a third person without the maker's fault. Shipman v. Bank of the State of New York (N. Y.) 791

3. A promissory note, although non-negotiable, need not express any consideration. Carnwright v. Gray (N. Y.) 845

4. A note payable "thirty days after death" may be a valid instrument. Id.

5. A stipulation in a promissory note, to pay all costs of collecting if not paid at maturity, does not destroy its negotiability. Montgomery v. Crosthwait (Ala.) 140

6. No new consideration is necessary in order to make valid a ratification of a note by one who was entitled to his release therefrom because of an alteration. Id.

7. The indorsement of a waiver of protest and notice of protest implies knowledge of all the paper contains at the time, and precludes any defense based on matters then apparent on the face of the instrument. Montgomery v. Crosthwait (Ala.) 140

8. Acknowledgment of liability by an indorser will not prevent his discharge for lack of notice of dishonor, unless made with full knowledge of his discharge. Rosson v. Carrol (Tenn.) 727

9. Statements by an indorser to third persons, merely showing that he thought himself still liable on a note from which he had been discharged by failure to give him notice of dishonor, does not establish an admission of liability. Id.

10. One who sends paper for collection, whether he indorses it or not, is entitled to notice of dishonor and to one day thereafter to notify prior indorsers. Id.

11. Demand of payment of a note indorsed when overdue, which is ineffectual because not followed by protest or notice, prevents any effectual demand and protest on a subsequent date. Id.

12. The time for notice of dishonor of a note is the same whether it was indorsed before or after maturity. Id.

13. An indorser of a forged bill is liable to the indorsee on its dishonor, without proof of demand or notice. Hamer v. Brainard (Utah) 434

14. The signature of the payee to an assignment written out on the back of a negotiable note makes him liable as an ordinary indorser. Maine Trust & Bkg. Co. v. Butler (Minn.) 370

15. The phrase "without recourse," or its equivalent, must be used to limit and qualify an indorsement made on the back of a negotiable note. Id.

16. Payments by the maker of a note which are not indorsed upon it are of no effect as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser of the note before maturity without notice of the payments. Kernohan v. Durham (Ohio) 41

17. An equitable claim of right or title to a negotiable note may be asserted by a third party not a party to the instrument, against an indorsee after maturity. Id.

18. An assignment of a mortgage and the note secured thereby as collateral security, before maturity of the note, accompanied by a delivery of the mortgage and what purported to be the note, but which was in fact a forgery of it, will pass a valid title to the note as against one to whom the assignor transfers the genuine note after maturity. Id.

19. An assignment of a note on which is indorsed a guaranty not referred to in the assignment, but which is all that gives the note any value, assigns the guaranty also. Lemmon v. Strong (Conn.) 270

BOUNDARIES.

1. The same rule governs as to the boundaries on streams of water of incorporated territories and of lands of individuals. N. Smith & V. B. Bridge Co. v. Hawkins (Ark.) 487

2. The boundary of an incorporated town or city on a navigable river in Arkansas, like that of an individual proprietor, extends only to high-water mark, although the county boundary goes to the middle of the channel. Id.

An ordinance establishing fire limits within which wooden buildings cannot be erected is authorized by a city charter giving the city power to make regulations for the prevention of fire, provided such means are proper or necessary to the accomplishment of the end in view. Olympia v. Mann (Wash.) 159

2. The reservation by a city council to itself, in an ordinance establishing fire limits within which the erection of wooden buildings is prohibited, of the right to grant special permits for the erection of such buildings within such limits, does not make the ordinance so unreasonable as to render it void. Id.

1. The fact that a passenger does not sign a ticket which constitutes a contract and has a blank space for his signature does not relieve him from the effects of its stipulations. Fonseca v. Ounard Steamship Co. (Mass.) 340

2. A ticket for a voyage, purporting to be a contract, containing written and printed folios which cover the greater part of two quarto pages, bearing the signature of the carrier's agent, with a blank space for that of the passenger, charges him with notice of the stipulations; and they are binding on him although he did not read them. Id.

8. A passenger who refuses to pay fare or leave the train, and who furnishes only a ticket which does not on its face entitle him to passage on that train, although he was told by the carrier's agent that he could ride upon it, cannot recover for injuries received in putting him off the train without more force than is necessary. He should either pay his fare, or quietly leave the train and resort to his appropriate remedy for any damages sustained. Peabody v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (Or.) 823

4. It is contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for one under no coercion or necessity, to attempt to get upon a moving train, no matter what the speed, in a place where a false step or a misstep would possibly, if not certainly, be serious. Hunter v. Cooperstown & S. V. R. Co. (N. Y.) 429

5. Ordinary care is required of a passenger in alighting from a train and leaving the platform; and in the absence of such care no recovery can be had for injuries sustained by falling over a raised portion of the platform. Graham v. Pennsylvania Co. (Pa.) 293

6. Riding on the platform of a street car when there is room inside is not negligence per se. Upham v. Detroit City R. Co. (Mich.) 139

7. For abuse and defamation of a passenger by the driver of a street car, who charges the passenger with having given him counterfeit money and threatens to have him arrested, the street-car company may be held liable. Lafitte v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. (La.) 337

8. A street-railroad company is not liable for the act of a driver without instructions in causing the arrest of a passenger on a charge of passing counterfeit money. Id.

9. Carriers are the insurers of baggage in the same manner and to the same extent as of goods or freight. Oakes v. Northern P. R. Co. (Or.) 818

10. Carriers of passengers are responsible for the carriage and safe delivery of such baggage as by custom and usage is ordinarily carried by travelers; and the payment of the usual fare includes, in legal contemplation, a compensation for the conveyance of such baggage. Id.

11. Baggage, within the rule of a carrier's liability, is confined to articles usually carried as such for the personal use of the passenger, or for his convenience, instruction, or amusement on the journey, and does not include that which is carried for the purpose of business,—such as merchandise or the like. Id.

12. Articles which are not properly personal baggage, but which are taken by the passenger as such with the carrier's knowledge, either with or without payment of an extra charge, will be regarded as such in respect to the carrier's liability. Id.

13. Stage properties, costumes, paraphernalia, advertising matter, etc., are not "baggage" within the rule of a carrier's liability, unless accepted as such. Id.

14. A receipt or contract stipulating that the carrier shall be liable only for a certain sum on the loss of an article, unless its just and true value is stated therein, will be upheld where no value is stated, if it was freely and voluntarily entered into, although the loss results from slight or ordinary negligence. Pacific Exp. Co. v. Foley (Kan.) 799

15. A statute giving railroad commissioners authority to fix joint rates for a railroad makes the rules thus fixed only prima facie evidence, although not expressly limiting them to that effect, where the only penalties are for charging unjust and unreasonable rates, and a former statute which did not extend to joint rates, and of which this was an amendment, expressly limited the effect of the commissioners' order as to rates, to prima facie evidence. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Doy (Iowa) 436

16. There is no uncertainty in a statute prescribing a penalty for unreasonable railroad charges, and declaring that rates fixed by railroad commissioners as the maximum shall be prima facie reasonable, on the ground that it does not permit any charge with certainty of its reasonableness, as the State is precluded from denying that the commissioners' rates are reasonable. Id.

17. A statute requiring freight in car-load lots to be transferred without unloading, unless the unloading is done without charge, and that smaller quantities shall be transferred into the cars of the connecting carrier at cost, which shall be made a part of the joint rate, does not interfere with the constitutional guarantees for the protection of the rights and property of the carriers. Id.

18. The power to establish joint "through rates" for connecting carriers is included within the power of the State to regulate rates of charges for transportation of freight by railroads. Id.

19. A railroad company is not compelled to enter involuntarily into contract relations with other companies, by a statute requiring the adoption of joint rates, or, in default thereof, the fixing of such rates by railroad commissioners, as in the latter case the obligation of the company as to the rates is one imposed by law, and not by contract. Id.

CHARITABLE USES.

1. The legal incapacity of a town to support a clergyman entirely defeats a bequest to it made "strictly on this condition," that it shall support him. Bullard v. Shirley (Mass.) 110
2. A bequest for an "art institute" is not void for indefiniteness,—especially when a codicil refers to its distribution of prizes for works "of the fine arts." Almy v. Jones (R. I.) 414
3. The phrase "worthy of the city," in a will giving a fund for an art institute when citizens have contributed funds necessary to found one worthy of the city, does not make the gift void for indefiniteness. Id.
4. A bequest is not void for remoteness where it gives a fund for an art institute, to take effect when the necessary funds to found one are contributed, and in the meanwhile the income is to be distributed annually in prizes for the best works of art by artists belonging to or residing in the State. Id.
5. A bequest is a lawful charity in every respect, where it is given for an art institute when established, and the income is to be given, in the mean time, in annual prizes for works of art. Id.
6. The promotion of the cause of temperance is too vague and uncertain as a description of the objects for which a corporation was formed to enable a court to say that funds contributed for the use of the corporation constitute a public charity which can be administered by a court of equity. Hence a division of the fund by the corporation among its own members is not such a perversion thereof as amounts to an injury to the public so as to demand a forfeiture of the corporate charter. *People, Attorney-General, v. ## CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. A contract to carry a passenger, exempting the carrier from liability even for negligence, if it was valid where it was made, will be upheld by the courts of a State in which such contracts are held void as against public policy. Fonseca v. Cunard Steamship Co. (Mass.) 840
2. The rate of interest on a contract between citizens of different States may be made according to the law of either State. Dugan v. Lewis (Tex.) 93
3. The law of Texas governs the rate of interest on notes secured by a trust deed given for money borrowed in New York, where the bargain was made and the money and papers delivered by an agent in behalf of a citizen of Texas, who signed and dated the papers in the latter State, where the stipulated rate of interest would have been usurious in New York, but not in Texas, and the deed of trust provides that the contract "shall be construed according to the law of the State of Texas, where the same is made." Id.
4. A conditional sale valid where it is made, by which the title is retained until the purchase money is paid, may be upheld against an innocent purchaser from the original vendee in another State to which the property is taken without payment, in accordance with the law of that State, although by the laws of the former State the conditional sale would be held invalid as to a bona fide purchaser, because not recorded. Weinstein v. Freyer (Ala.) 700
5. A bequest of personalty to a "community" in a foreign country is valid if it has capacity to take by the laws of that country. Re Huss (N. Y.) 620

6. The question as to who are the heirs at law of a person, within the meaning of a Massachusetts will which gives them an estate in a certain event if he is not then living, is to be determined by the law of Massachusetts, although the person named is domiciled in another State. *Proctor v. A combination between coal producers in one State and coal dealers in another to regulate prices of coal in a certain city, and to divide any advances in price in excess of the advances in freights, and tending to monopolize the coal trade of the city among members of the combination, is in violation of Act of Congress July 2, 1890, prohibiting conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce. *United States v. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. See also CONTRACTS, 25, 26.

1. Constitutional provisions are to be construed with reference to prior well-known practices and usages. Johnston v. State, Sefton (Ind.) 235

2. The next of kin of a person are not deprived of any "property" by a statute which provides that on the death of the person the personal property shall go to other persons; and therefore the constitutional provision as to depriving persons of "property" does not apply to the statute so far as it relates to them. Dibrell v. Lanier (Tenn.) 70

3. The right to transmit property by inheritance to one's descendants or next of kin is "property," within the meaning of the constitutional provision that a person shall not be deprived of property except by judgment of his peers or of the law of the land. Id.

4. A statute providing that the personal estate of an intestate lunatic, if derived from an intestate husband or wife, shall go to the latter's next of kin, is unconstitutional because the classification of persons thereby made is unnatural, arbitrary, and capricious, in consequence of which the statute is not a "law of the land" within the meaning of the Constitution. Id.

5. Special proceedings applicable to the specified subject-matter, and conformable to the rules requiring notice and the acquisition of jurisdiction, and which affect all persons alike whose property or rights come within the lawful scope of the proceedings, are prosecuted 12 L. R. A.

with "due process of law." Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 456

6. Permitting the recovery of attorneys' fees on recovery against a railroad company for violation of a statute regulating rates does not violate the constitutional provision as to equality. Id.

7. The regulation of the pressure of natural gas transported in pipes is within the police power of the Legislature, to be exercised according to its discretion, in the absence of facts to show oppression or usurpation under a pretext of exercising police power. Jamieson v. Indiana Natural Gas & O. Co. (Ind.) 659

CONTRACTS. See also MISTAKE; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 4.

1. A promise, in consideration of permission to insure the life of a person, to pay his wife a sum of money after his death, is on a void consideration where the promisor has no insurable interest in the life on which the insurance is taken, and therefore cannot be enforced. Burbage v. Windley (N. C.) 409

2. An agreement by grocers not to buy any butter from the makers for two years, if a firm shall open a butter store in the place, is void for lack of consideration, where such firm neither pays anything therefor nor buys any established plant, place of business, or goodwill. Chaplin v. Brown (Iowa) 438

3. A minor's abstinence from intoxicating liquors and tobacco, and from swearing and playing cards or billiards for money, is a good consideration for a promise by his uncle to pay him a sum of money. Hamor v. Sidway (N. Y.) 463

4. There is sufficient consideration for a contract to settle litigation between corporations, under a patent which both parties suppose to be, but which is not in fact, valid,—especially where the contract includes mutual covenants as to the conduct of their business, and is partly executed before the invalidity of the patent is discovered. Gloucester Ininglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. (Mass.) 563

5. A promise by a board to pay for heating apparatus for a public building, made to induce the completion thereof by the other party, who had already partly furnished it under agreement with the chief contractor for the building, who had made default in payment, is an original, and not a collateral, contract within the Statute of Frauds. Gibson County Comrs. v. Cincinnati Steam Heating Co. (Ind.) 502

6. The words "two-thirds part at the least of the thing demised," in the exception as to leases for not more than three years, in the Statute of Frauds, mean two-thirds part of the rental value of the demised premises, and not of the value of the fee. Childers v. Lee (N. M.) 67

7. A series of papers appearing to relate to the same contract may constitute a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds, although only one of them is signed by the party to be charged. Freeland v. Rits (Mass.) 561

8. A written agreement for a sublease, "to be made subject" to a lease not yet in existence, but which is to be obtained, is not, for that reason, insufficient under the Statute of Frauds after such lease is obtained in writing. Id.

9. A parol agreement to adopt a child as heir and to leave her all one's property at death is within the Statute of Frauds, where the estate at death consists of property of which a parol transfer is not valid under the statute. Austin v. Davis (Ind.) 120

10. Performance on the part of a girl, of a parol contract to live with a man and his wife during their lives, in consideration of their agreement to leave her all their property, will not take the agreement out of the Statute of Frauds. Id.

11. A man is not prevented from transferring his property, by an agreement to leave all his property at death to an adopted child, if the transfer is not made for the purpose of defrauding the latter. Id.

12. A bond reciting the proposal of a board of commissioners "to advance" the money to the obligor, who binds himself to complete the job of furnishing heating apparatus for a public building, in consequence of the default of the principal contractor for the building, is a contract to pay for the work when completed, and not merely to "advance" money. Gibson County Comrs. v. Cincinnati Steam Heating Co. (Ind.) 502

13. The word "shipped," in a contract by a lessee of a quarry to pay certain rates for stone shipped, cannot be construed to include stone not shipped, although quarried and ready for shipment. Crawford v. Oman & S. Stone Co. (S. C.) 875

14. The words "dimension stone," in a quarry lease fixing prices for such stone, must be construed in their technical trade meaning, in the absence of anything in the contract to indicate the contrary, where both parties are quarry men. Id.

15. Time is not of the essence of a contract for the sale of real estate, unless made so by the express agreement of the parties, or by the nature of the contract itself, or by the circumstances under which it was made. Courts of equity will ordinarily infer that interest on the deferred payments will be a sufficient compensation for the delay. Frink v. Thomas (Or.) 239

16. Although there is no stipulation in the contract that time shall be essential, or anything in the nature or circumstances of the agreement to make it so, it can nevertheless be made so by a performance, or tender of performance, by one party and a demand of the other. Id.

17. Where the payment of the purchase money and the making of the deed are to occur simultaneously, they are regarded as concurrent acts which disable either party from putting an end to the contract without performance, or a valid offer to perform, on his part. Id.

18. The agreement is void as tending to 12 L. R. A.

create a monopoly, where all the grocers in a town agree to give up dealing in butter if a new firm shall establish a butter store in the place and pay as much as dealers in neighboring towns. Chaplin v. Brown (Iowa) 428

19. A purchase of stock by a broker for his customer, who puts up a margin, and, aside from commissions and interest, simply receives or pays the difference between the buying and selling values, is invalid under Cal. Const. art. 4, § 26, as a sale of stock on margin, and can give the broker no right to enforce the customer's indebtedness to him thereon. Cushman v. Root (Cal.) 511

20. An agreement to prevent competition between two corporations in the manufacture of fish glue under a patent, whereby an article nearly worthless is to be converted into one of large value, is not against public policy. Gloucester Ininglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. (Mass.) 563

21. Objection to a variance between a lease agreed upon and the one delivered is waived by refusal to accept any lease. Freeland v. Rits (Mass.) 561

22. Mere failure to pay the purchase money according to the terms of the contract will not entitle the vendor to have a contract rescinded. Frink v. Thomas (Or.) 239

23. On the destruction by fire of a building towards the erection of which the contractor is to contribute only part of the labor and materials, while the owner is to do the grading, excavating, stone work, brick work, painting, and plumbing, the contractor is discharged from his obligation, and can recover on an implied assumpsit for the value of what he has already done. Butterfield v. Byron (Mass.) 571

24. A contract is invalidated by the subsequent enactment of police regulations which render its performance illegal as to one of the parties. Jamieson v. Indiana Natural Gas & O. Co. (Ind.) 652

25. An innovation or change in the law by a judicial decision does not impair the obligation of an existing contract, where neither the Constitution, nor a statute, nor any enactment that has the force of the law, is applied to affect the contract. Ray v. Western Pennsylvania Natural Gas Co. (Pa.) 290

26. A statute empowering the state auditor to institute proceedings for the dissolution of insurance companies which upon examination seem to be insolvent, or in such condition as to render their further continuance in business hazardous to the insured or to the public, and to apply for an injunction to prevent their further proceeding with the business, and for a receiver,—is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Swigert (Ill.) 828

27. Overruling decisions of the state court of last resort which were in force at the time a mortgage was given by a married woman, and which upheld its validity under the statutes, does not affect the right of the mortgagee. Farrior v. New England Mortg. S. Co. (Ala.) 856

CORPORATIONS. See also ACKNOWLEDGMENT; CHARITABLE USES, 6; CONTRACTS, 26; EVIDENCE, 15; LIENS, 2.

1. The State alone can complain of a completed contract entered into by a corporation in violation of constitutional or statutory requirements. Wood v. Corry Waterworks Co. (C. C. W. D. Pa.) 168

2. A corporation which has received and enjoyed the fruits of its mortgage bonds cannot assail their validity in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, on the ground that they exceeded in amount one half of the capital stock paid in, contrary to the statute. Id.

3. The fact that the constitutional requirement as to notice to stockholders was not complied with before the execution of a mortgage of the corporate property is not a valid defense to a suit on the mortgage, if every stockholder was present when the mortgage was determined on and voted in favor of it, and the corporation has received the benefit of the money raised thereby. Id.

4. A corporation which has entered into and received the benefits of a contract which it had the power to make will not be permitted to avoid paying the consideration money, by showing that in making the contract it did not conform to the statutory requirements and limitations imposed on it. Id.

5. A corporation which used mules in its business is liable on notes for mules given in its name by its president, where he had frequently bought mules of the payee and given therefor notes of the corporation, which it had always paid, and the seller had no reason to suppose that the present purchase was not made for the corporation as the president represented it to be. Sparks v. Despatch Transfer Co. (Mo.) 714

6. Persons acting as directors of a corporation when less than the necessary amount of stock has been subscribed, and they are without authority to create any corporate obligation, become personally liable though acting in good faith. Farmers Co.-Op. T. Co. v. Floyd (Ohio) 846

7. A director or stockholder is not chargeable as such with actual knowledge of the business transactions of the corporation. Rudd v. Robinson (N. Y.) 478

8. The denial of his right to vote will not justify one who has a majority of the stock of a corporation in withdrawing from a meeting and organizing another meeting and voting there; but his vote at the original meeting would have been effective notwithstanding the rejection. Re Argus Printing Co. (N. D.) 781

9. Holders of a majority of the stock of a corporation, after acquiescing in the organization of a meeting and participating in its business, cannot withdraw and organize another meeting at the same time and place. Id.

10. A vote of stockholders representing a majority of the subscribed capital stock is necessary to the choice of a director. Id.

11. The pledgee of stock, in whose name it stands on the corporate records, has a right to vote the stock at a meeting of the directors, and the pledgor has not; but equity may compel the pledgee in a proper case to give him a proxy. Id.

12. To be eligible as a director under a statute which requires directors to be stockholders, a person must appear to be a stockholder on the corporate records. Id.

13. The transferee of stock upon the corporate records is qualified to vote and become a director, although the transfer was made for the express and sole purpose of so qualifying him, if it was not in furtherance of a fraudulent scheme. Id.

14. Before a corporation can safely permit a transfer, upon its books, of stock which belonged to a deceased person, and which it knows has been directed by order of court to be sold by the administrator at private sale, it should ascertain whether or not such a sale has been made under the order as vests title in the purchaser. If it fails to do so, it is liable to make good any loss occasioned by its permitting the transfer. Citizens Street R. Co. v. Robbins (Ind.) 496

15. One who, in good faith and without notice, purchases in the market a certificate of stock which has been wrongfully issued by the corporation in lieu of certificates which belonged to a decedent's estate, and which were not legally sold and disposed of by the administrator, receives a good title as against the decedent's estate, if there was nothing on the face of the certificate to put him on inquiry or to give him notice of the infirmity of the title. Such purchaser cannot be required to make an examination of the records to ascertain the validity of the title, before he can safely purchase it. Id.

16. Payment of a stock subscription amounting to $250,000, by a bond for title to land on which only $5,000 had been paid and which was worth no more than the price at which it was bought, leaves the subscribers liable to creditors for the difference between the actual value of the land and the amount of the subscription, where the State Constitution prohibits the issue of stock except for money or property actually received, and statutes require payments by property to be at its money value. Elyton Land Co. v. Birmingham Warehouse & Elev. Co. (Ala.) 807

17. A corporation may, if it acts in good faith, lawfully receive from its subscribers who have paid a certain percentage of their subscriptions, a surrender of the certificates held by them, and issue, in lieu thereof, certificates for as many fully paid shares of stock as the money paid in will buy, thereby releasing them from further liability, as far as the claims of the company itself are concerned. Republic L. Ins. Co. v. Swigert (Ill.) 828

18. In a statutory proceeding by the state auditor to wind up a corporation, to which the stockholders are not made parties, the corporation has the duty to protect their rights; and it may therefore object to the making of an order directing the receiver to bring suits for unpaid stock subscriptions. Id.

19. Stockholders are liable as partners on contracts of a corporation which they have undertaken to form for a certain business under the laws of another State, solely because a corporation for such business could not be legally organized in the State where it was to be carried on. Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex. App.) 866

20. The State only can question the right of foreign corporations to hold lands in excess of the amount limited by statute. American Mortg. Co. v. Tennille (Ga.) 529

21. The law of comity does not require that a mercantile corporation organized under the laws of another State shall be allowed to do business in Texas, as the repeal in 1885 of a statute granting the privilege of organizing mercantile corporations is a direct prohibition against the operation of such corporations in the State. Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex. App.) 866 to government land is still pending in and undetermined by the land department of the United States, the courts of a State will not interfere. Frink v. Thomas (Or.) 239

2. A circuit court of the United States has no jurisdiction in an action at law upon a note to enforce a specific lien upon property conveyed to secure it, according to a remedy and practice given by state law, without foreclosure proceedings. American Freehold Land & Mortg. Co. v. Thomas (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 681

3. Circuit courts of the United States may constitutionally be given jurisdiction of suits by the government to enjoin illegal combinations in restraint of interstate commerce; and it does not depend on diverse citizenship of the parties. United States v. Jellico Mountain Coke & O. Co. (C. C. M. D. Tenn.) 753

4. Congress may give the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction when a right arises under a law of the United States. Copp v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (La.) 725

5. A state court has no jurisdiction of an action for damages against a carrier for violation of the Interstate Commerce Law, as that provides for redress, either by procedure before the Commission or suit before a federal court. Id.

6. A claim against the United States for damages to rice fields by the construction of a dam in making harbor improvements is one sounding in tort, and is not within the jurisdiction of the circuit court. Mills v. United States (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 678

7. Membership in a state bar association does not disqualify a judge to hear a proceeding brought by it for the disbarment of an attorney, although the association may be liable for the costs if defeated. Ex parte Alabama State Bar Assn. (Ala.) 184

8. Proceedings before a special judge, even by consent of parties, are coram non judge and void if the regular judge is not in fact disqualified, although he supposes he is and refuses to sit. Id.

9. A probate judge cited by the probate judge of another district to act in his place, who acts with the assent of the clerk, is a judge de jure, although the statute prescribes that the "clerk of the court shall cite" the judge in such cases, as that provision is merely directory. Gallup v. Smith (Conn.) 853

10. Officers of school districts are included in the words "all other officers," in Ill. Act April 8, 1873 (Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 46), giving the county court jurisdiction of contests of election of county, township, and precinct officers, and all other officers for the contest of whose election no provision is made. Misch v. Russell (Ill.) 125

11. Courts must uphold a statute unless it is so plainly and palpably in conflict with the Constitution as to leave no doubt or hesitation in the judicial mind as to its invalidity. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 436

12. A question not raised by the pleadings as to the power of a city to sell coal under its streets, cannot be raised for adjudication by stipulation of the parties, in an action by the city for trespass in removing such coal, where no contract has been in fact made or attempted before the suit, but one is agreed on in such stipulation, providing the court will uphold the power of the city to make it. Union Coal Co. v. La Salle (Ill.) 826

1. A custom of others to be equally negligent is no defense to one charged with negligence. Columbus & H. C. & L. Co. v. Tucker (Ohio) 577

2. A usage which is not according to law, though universal, cannot be set up to control the law. Id.

DAMAGES.

1. Punitive damages are recoverable of a railroad company for disregard of its statutory duty to stop at a station for a passenger, when it has advertised for passengers for that train and has room for them, or could by reasonable diligence have had cars enough to accommodate them. Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (N. C.) 118

2. Damages resulting directly from a wrongful act are recoverable, as a general rule, whether they could or could not have been foreseen or contemplated as a probable result. Sahmaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 257

3. The measure of damages for quarrying and carrying away stone by trespassers, in a suit by lessees merely of the exclusive right to quarry the stone, does not extend to the full value of the stone, but merely to the damages actually occasioned by invasion of such 13 L. R. A.

exclusive right; but nominal damages at least should be granted. Baker v. Hari (N. Y.) 60

4. The measure of damages in an action against an agent for making a contract with plaintiff without authority is the loss sustained by the failure of the contract. Farmers Co-Op. T. Co. v. Floyd (Ohio) 346

5. The price to be paid to a volunteer for enduring suffering caused by a personal injury cannot be regarded as the standard in determining the amount of damages in an action for such injury; and an instruction which suggests such an idea of a price, in connection with the difficulty in fixing the amount, is misleading. Spaulding v. Pennsylvania Co. (Pa.) 698

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Damages; measure of, for personal injuries, pain, and suffering. 698

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

A loan of money to a corporation will render it liable for the debt, although the note of individuals, instead of the note of the corporation, was taken therefor because it was supposed to be better security. The test is whether the note was received as a consideration for the money, or only as a security. Philadelphia Third Nat. Bank's Appeal (Pa.) 238

1. A debt is any kind of obligation of one man to pay money to another. Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt (Cal.) 503

2. Delusions are conceptions that originate spontaneously in the mind, without evidence of any kind to support them, and can be accounted for on no reasonable hypothesis. Potter v. Jones (Or.) 161

8. A belief or aversion formed on apparent cause, leading to an erroneous view of conduct, however insufficient the state of facts on which it is based may be, shows only an error of judgment or want of reasoning power, but not an absolute want of intellect on the subject, and therefore does not constitute an insane delusion. Potter v. Jones (Or.) 161

DELEGATION OF POWER. See PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS, 4, 5.

DELIVERY. See DEED, 1; MORTGAGE, 8.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION. See also CONTRACTS, 11.

1. Where a will contains no devise of lands, but the testator has disposed of his entire estate by means of a power to sell and divide the proceeds of sale, the lands descend to his heirs at law subject to the power of sale and the trusts declared thereon contained in the will. Morse v. Hackensack Sav. Bank (N. J.) 63

3. The estate of an heir at law intermediate the testator's death and the exercise of a power of sale is an actual estate which is alienable, devisable, and descendible, and liable to seizure and sale of lands; but when the power of sale is executed, the estate of the heir or his alienee is determined, and the purchaser under the power becomes seized, under the devise, by a title paramount to the title of the heir by descent. Id.

8. A widow is an "heir" of her husband to the extent of $5,000. up to which she is given an estate in fee by Mass. Stat. 1880, chap. 811, but not in respect to the life estate given by Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 90, § 15 (Mass. Stat. 1854, chap. 406, § 1), which is a purely optional interest in lieu of dower. Consequently she can take only the sum of $5,000 under a will in favor of his "heirs." Proctor v. Clark (Mass.) 721

DIVORCE. See HUSBAND AND WIFE, 4-6.

DOWER.

1. A widow cannot be compelled to release her dower in lands sold by her husband by a contract which she did not sign. Sloan v. Williams (Ill.) 496

2. The express denial of dower, in New York statutes, where a divorce is granted for the wife's adultery, does not by implication give dower in case of annulment of a marriage made in good faith, because the husband had a former wife living. Price v. Price (N. Y.) 859

3. No dower right exists in favor of a woman whose marriage was annulled because the husband had a wife living, although she had not been heard from within five years before the second marriage, which was contracted by both parties in good faith, and was therefore valid under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 189, § 6, until its nullity was pronounced by a court. Id.

A dummy railroad operated by steam and running beyond the lines of a municipality, organized under Ala. Act Feb. 25, 1887, which authorizes corporations to construct such roads in a city or town and also "upon any of the public roads of any county," upon such terms and in such manner as may be authorized by the city and county authorities respectively, is a "railroad" within the meaning of Ala. Code, § 1145, requiring trains to be stopped within 100 feet of a place where the track crosses the track of another railroad. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs (Ala.) 830

EJECTMENT.

1. A writ of restitution will not be granted to restore to a defendant in ejectment the possession of property taken under a writ of possession, merely because the latter was not issued within a year and a day after the rendition of the judgment. Bowser v. Chicago W. D. R. Co. (Ill.) 81

13. The common-law rule that a writ of possession cannot be issued to enforce a judgment in ejectment after the lapse of a year and a day is abrogated in Illinois by the statute, which, though making no express provision as to writs of possession, provides that execution may issue upon a judgment at any time within seven years,—especially when construed with another statute providing that rules of pleading and practice in other actions are applied to actions of ejectment. Id.

1. In the present state of electrical science a telephone company cannot maintain a bill for an injunction against the operation of an electric railway, to prevent damages incidentally sustained by the escape of electricity from its rails. Cumberland Teleph. & Tel. Co. v. United Electric R. Co. (C. C. M. D. Tenn.) 544

3. Interference with the ground circuit of a telephone system by the subsequent introduction of the "single-trolley system" of electric-street railways, of which the ground also is a constituent part, interferes with no vested right of the telephone company, and gives it no right of action. Cincinnati Inclined Plane R. Co. v. City & S. Tel. Assn. (Ohio) 534

8. Disturbance of a telephone system previously established, the poles and wires of which are upon the streets, by the introduction of electro motive power upon a street railway, entitles the telephone company to no remedy except to readjust its methods to meet the new conditions. Id.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. The building, by a State or its grantees, of wharves upon the shore of navigable waters, will not constitute either a taking or damaging of the private property of riparian proprietors for public use. Eisenbach v. Hatfield (Wash.) 683

2. Damage to rice fields by the construction of a dam in harbor improvements, thus raising the low-water level in a navigable river, and destroying the drainage of the fields, and increasing their liability to overflow in time of freshets, does not constitute a taking of the property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision for compensation. The rights of riparian owners are subordinate to the power of the government to control and improve navigation. Mills v. United States (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 678

3. A railroad is located so as to exclude the appropriation of the land selected by another road, when a definite location has been adopted by the action of the company; but the act of the engineer in staking out the line is not a sufficient location. Williamsport & N. B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. (Pa.) 220

4. The whole improvement must be taken into consideration in determining whether property is damaged by a public improvement, —such as the change of grade of a street. Springer v. Chicago (Ill.) 609

5. No damages can be recovered on account of a public improvement, where no property is actually taken, if its fair market value is as much immediately after as before the improvement. Id.

6. Compensation for the erection of a telegraph line in a street must be made to abutting owners, although the fee of the street is in the public; and the right thereto cannot be defeated by action of the municipal authorities. Stowers v. Postal Tele. C. Co. (Miss.) 864

1. Where a vendee enters into possession of land under a contract of purchase, he will not be permitted to obtain an outstanding title and assert it against his vendor, but such title will enure to the benefit of the vendor. Prink v. Thomas (Or.) 289

2. Where the vendor is prevented from complying with his contract by the wrongful act of the vendee in obtaining an outstanding title to a portion of the land, so far as that portion of the land is concerned, in a suit by the vendor to rescind, the vendee is estopped from claiming that no tender of the deed has been made. Id.

3. Specific performance of a contract will not be defeated for failure of consideration, where, after knowledge of the failure, the defendant has chosen to avail himself of the benefits of the contract and to go on under it. Gloucester Isinglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. (Mass.) 563

4. A person is not estopped from denying that a so-called corporation with which he has made a contract is in fact a legal corporation, and from claiming that the stockholders are individually liable on the contract. Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex. App.) 366

5. Silence of a legatee who had said she was to be paid $10,000, on the reply of the testatrix that $3,000 of it had been paid, is not an admission of such payment. Jaques v. Swasey (Mass.) 566

6. A candidate is not estopped from obtaining a writ of mandamus to compel election officers to decide a tie vote by lot, according to law, by the fact that he requested them not to do so, since all parties had equal knowledge of the law, and the duty was to the public, and not simply to the candidate. *Johnston v. #### NOTES AND BRIEFS.

I. JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. Courts must take judicial notice of a treaty with a foreign government. Ex parte McCabe (D. C. W. D. Tex.) 589

2. Judicial notice will be taken of the relative distances from a certain place to another part of the same State and to neighboring States. Jamieson v. Indiana Natural Gas & O. Co. (Ind.) 652

3. Judicial notice will be taken of the course of business of railroad companies to transfer cars over more than one railroad without breaking bulk. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 486

4. Courts take judicial notice of the fact that natural gas is a dangerous agency. Jamieson v. Indiana Natural Gas & O. Co. (Ind.) 652

II. PRESUMPTIONS; BURDEN OF PROOF.

5. A foreign law proved by a governmental publication is presumed to continue until the present time, in the absence of proof to the contrary. Re Huss (N. Y.) 620

6. The burden of proving that a note was altered after indorsement is upon the indorser, where he relies on that fact as a defense. Montgomery v. Orshwast (Ala.) 140

7. The signing of a deed by the grantor and its possession by the grantee constitute prima facie evidence of delivery. Devereux v. McMahon (N. C.) 205

8. The fall of a large wooden sign of its own weight from its position over a public sidewalk raises the presumption of negligence in respect to its fastenings. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hopkins (Ark.) 189

9. The provision of a statute that rates fixed by railroad commissioners shall be regarded as prima facie reasonable is within the power of the State as to prescribing rules of evidence in all proceedings under the laws of the State. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 486

10. The presumption is that county officers in making changes in the heating apparatus of a new public building made only such as were proper. Gibson County Comrs. v. Cincinnati Steam Heating Co. (Ind.) 502

11. The presumption in favor of the validity of a judgment does not extend to a case of personal service on a defendant who is a non-resident, where the proof does not show whether or not the service was made within the State. Rand v. Hanson (Mass.) 574

12. The burden of proof is upon a company owning a railroad in operation, to show that it does not itself operate it. Peabody v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (Or.) 828

III. DOCUMENTARY; PAROL AS TO WRITINGS.

13. A mistake of the register of deeds in copying the true name of a witness to a deed on the records, instead of the letters "D. S. C.," which constituted the actual signature of the witness, will not annul the probate or destroy the competency of a copy of the record as evidence. Devereux v. McMahon (N. C.) 205

14. An objection that there is a variance between the original and a copy of the record of a deed, which copy is made evidence by N. C. Code, § 1251, without accounting for the original unless upon a rule or order of court suggesting a variance or other sufficient ground, will not avail after the copy has been read in evidence, and the original thereafter voluntarily furnished the other party without any order of court. Id.

15. Books of account of a corporation are not competent evidence of themselves to establish an account or claim against a trustee or stockholder, in an action brought in behalf of the corporation. Rudd v. Robinson (N. Y.) 478

16. A judgment for the plaintiff in an action for the seduction of his daughter is not competent evidence against her son, in an action to enforce his claim to be the lawful heir of such judgment defendant. Biscotford v. Clum (N. Y.) 836

17. An oral condition that an order shall "be no sale" if the market price is not as it is represented is a condition subsequent, and not precedent, and cannot be proved to affect the terms of an unconditional written order. Lilienthal v. Suffolk Brew. Co. (Mass.) 821

18. Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a negotiable note signed by an individual in his own name merely, with nothing on its face to show any intent to bind anyone but himself, was given by him as president of a corporation. Sparks v. Despatch Transfer Co. (Mo.) 714

19. Evidence that no witnesses were sworn or hearing had before a probate judge as stated in the records of the probate court is inadmissible. Gallup v. Smith (Conn.) 353

IV. VIEW OF JURY.

20. Courts have power to permit a view by the jury of premises the damage to which is the subject of controversy in a civil action. Springer v. Chicago (Ill.) 600

21. A statute making it obligatory on a court to permit a jury in eminent-domain proceedings to view the premises, on application of either party, does not exclude the common-law right of a court in other cases to permit a view in its discretion. Id.

V. OPINIONS.

22. Opinions of witnesses, expert or other, are not admissible where the circumstances can be fully and adequately described to the jury, and are such that their bearing on the issue can be estimated by all men without special knowledge or training. Graham v. Pennsylvania Co. (Pa.) 298

23. Opinions of witnesses that a raised part of a depot platform or broad step 4 feet wide and 9 inches high is a dangerous place are not admissible, as a brief statement would convey a perfect comprehension of the place, and jurymen are capable of judging of the danger. Id.

24. The opinion of an expert may be given on the question whether the word in the date of a written instrument is "Jany" or "July." Dresler v. Hard (N. Y.) 456

25. On the question whether or not a proper distribution of samples in a city was made by an agent, a witness may testify that he made an investigation and could not find that any distribution was being made. Perry v. Jensen (Pa.) 393

26. An experienced advertiser and distributor of samples is competent to testify that distribution of samples of a medicine for dyspepsia through a district telegraph company is not a proper method of distribution by an agent to whom samples are furnished, and whose contract requires him to use "his best reasonable endeavors to introduce and sell the medicine." Id.

27. One who has been in the advertising business more than twenty years, and has distributed pamphlets and samples, including some of a medical nature, for various business establishments, in several large cities and in different States, is competent to testify whether or not 481,000 samples of a medicine for dyspepsia was a reasonable number to be furnished to an advertising agent in one year for his distribution. So also is a witness who for several years has been manager of a chemical company which dealt in infants' food and pepsin preparations, and which, he says, has distributed many samples and at least a half million circulars throughout the United States, in different localities. Id.

28. Statements of a witness that a party "examined the note thoroughly" is admissible, where the issue is as to the party's knowledge of the way the note was signed. Montgomery v. Crosthwait (Ala.) 140

VI. DECLARATIONS; RELEVANCY; WEIGHT.

29. Declarations of voters, made before or after election, and not as part of the res gesta, are not admissible in an election contest to show their disqualification. Rucks v. Renfrow (Ark.) 362

30. Statements of advertisers in a newspaper at the time of withdrawing their patronage, that it was because they had been visited by a committee of a typographical union and were threatened with loss of business, are admissible as part of the res gesta in an action to enjoin a boycott. Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3 (C. C. S. D. Ohio) 193

31. A man's declarations that he is married and that a certain child is his son and heir, although not admissible to prove marriage, as part of the res gesta, when he never lived or cohabited with the alleged wife and never had anything to do with the son, are admissible as hearsay evidence concerning pedigree, on the question of the legitimacy of the son. Eisenlord v. Clum (N. Y.) 836

32. Communications to an attorney acting as the agent of both parties to a controversy are not privileged in an action between such parties. Haley v. Eureka County Bank (Nev.) 815 out on cross-examination. Montgomery v. Crosthwait (Ala.) 140

33. A conversation in the presence of an attorney is not a privileged communication in an action between the parties to the controversy. Id.

35. Evidence that many well-regulated furnaces habitually employ inexperienced men for a particular service is admissible on the question of negligence in employing such men for that kind of work in a furnace. Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (Ala.) 283

36. Precautions after an accident, to prevent other accidents, cannot be proved for the purpose of showing that they were needed at the time of the accident, as an admission of negligence. Shinners v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals (Mass.) 554

37. An offer to sell property may be proved against the owner as an admission of its value at or near the time of the offer. Springer v. Chicago (Ill.) 609

38. Testimony of witnesses as to their offers for horses need not be admitted to show the soundness of the horses, where they have already testified fully that the horses were sound. Hobart v. Young (Vt.) 693

39. Testimony that a notice of dishonor was given by a witness a "day or two after he received notice," and that it was "on the 16th or 17th of April, immediately after" he received notice,—is insufficient to show that it was given in due time. Rosson v. Carroll (Tenn.) 727

40. A notary's testimony that he has an "impression" that he sent a notice of protest to a certain person by mail is not sufficient proof of that fact, where his certificate states merely that he handed the notices to an express agent from whom the notes had been received. Id.

EXECUTION. See also LEVY AND SEIZURE.

A sheriff's deed on the sale of lands under an execution takes effect as an actual conveyance from the date of the sale, and not from the date of the execution and delivery of the deed. Morse v. Hackensack Sav. Bank (N. J.) 63

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

1. There can be no executor de son tort where the statute laws of a State on the subject of administration, taken together as forming one entire system, are wholly repugnant to and inconsistent with the common law in that respect. Roselle v. Harmon (Mo.) 187

3. Where a testator by his will directs the sale of his lands and the division of the proceeds among his heirs at law, the latter may dispense with the sale, and elect to take the lands in lieu of the proceeds of sale. Morse v. Hackensack Sav. Bank (N. J.) 63

3. The principle on which the doctrine of election rests is the identity of the interest the heirs take as heirs at law and in the proceeds of the conversion. When the testator charges his estate, real and personal, with the payment of his debts, and directs his executors to sell his real and personal estate and divide the proceeds between his two children, the latter cannot elect to take the lands as heirs at law, and by such election impair or defeat the rights of testator's creditors. Id.

4. A nonresident plaintiff may sue a foreign executor who has taken out ancillary letters, although the precise force and effect of the judgment in such a case is not determined. Hopper v. Hopper (N. Y.) 287

5. A foreign executor becomes a domestic executor liable to be sued as such, when he takes out ancillary letters. Id.

6. Although the common-law right of the administrator to dispose of decedent's personal property does not exist, and the terms of an order of court allowing property to be disposed of at private sale must be strictly complied with, yet an approval of the sale by the court is not necessary to pass the title if the court's order does not require a confirmation. The title passes upon the purchaser's compliance with the terms of the sale. Citizens Street R. Co. v. Robbins (Ind.) 498

7. A private sale, by an administrator, of personal property of the decedent upon a credit of ten years, with the purchaser's individual note as security, is void if made under an order of the court which permits a private sale but directs the taking of good and sufficient security for payment of purchase money, without naming the time of credit to be allowed, where the statute allows a credit of only one year. Id.

EXTRADITION.

1. The law of nations does not require the surrender of a fugitive, whether citizen or alien, to a foreign government, in the absence of a treaty stipulation requiring it. Ex parte McCabe (D. C. W. D. Tex.) 589

2. A citizen of the United States cannot be surrendered to Mexico as a fugitive, under the treaty with that country, which provides that "neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens." The 12 L. R. A.

surrender is not to be made according to the will or discretion of the Executive, but only when required by the treaty. Id.

3. A warrant to compel a person demanded as a criminal by a foreign government to appear and submit to a preliminary examination, when issued by a county judge under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5370, although he styles himself also an extradition agent, is not invalid because it does not recite the source of his authority to issue it. Id.

4. A complaint made under oath is necessary to authorize a warrant to compel a preliminary examination of a person demanded by a foreign government as a criminal. Id.

FENCES.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Fences; statutory provisions concerning; rights of adjoining owners; unlawful removal. 603

FINES.

Penalties imposed upon railroad corporations for violation of statutes are not excessive, if no greater than are necessary to enforce obedience to the statute, although they might appear excessive if imposed upon individuals. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 486

FIRES.

Where a city is given power to make regulations for the prevention of fire, and the propriety or necessity of the methods to be pursued to accomplish that object is left to the discretion of the council, the courts will not be warranted in setting aside as improper an ordinance adopting means which the council has by its acts declared proper. Olympia v. Mann (Wash.) 150

FIXTURES.

An agreement by a life tenant that buildings erected on the land shall remain chattels and be removable by the builder is not valid as to remaindermen, so as to authorize their removal after the expiration of the life tenancy. Demby v. Pares (Ark.) 87

FORFEITURE. See LANDLORD AND TENANT, 3, 4.

FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

1. False statements as to the market price of hops, made to the president of a brewing company to induce the purchase of a car-load, do not justify its rescission, where he had said as to the statements first made that he did not believe them, and as to others that he had no means of information, and in addition made an oral condition, on giving a written order for the hops, that it should be no sale if the price was not as represented. Lilienthal v. Suffolk Brew. Co. (Mass.) 891

2. There may be circumstances and conditions under which the default of creditors in not requiring the execution of a power of sale in their favor may amount to laches which a court of equity will lay hold of as proof of:

fraud; but in such cases the ground of relief is fraud in knowingly permitting a power of sale to be kept outstanding as a standing menace, with intent to protect trust property from the creditors of the person ultimately entitled. Morse v. Hackensack Sav. Bank (N. J.) 62

1. In dation en paiement, delivery and possession are essential to operate a transfer so as to exclude third persons; and everything doubtful or ambiguous must be interpreted against the transferee. Bernard v. Whitney Nat. Bank (La.) 802

2. A valid gift of a note retained in the holder's possession is not made by a sealed instrument acknowledged and attested by witnesses, which declares that he does "hereby give" the note, and says, in a later clause, that the money is "to be given . . . when the note falls due," for specified purposes. *Gammon Theo. 1. Permission may be granted by an incorporated town, under Iowa Code, § 456, to a private person to place weighing scales in a street in front of his lots, where they will serve the public convenience and do not constitute an obstruction to travel. Spencer v. Andrew (Iowa) 115

2. A town is estopped from revoking permission to a person to place scales in a street in front of his lot, until the interests of the public require a revocation, where, on the faith of the permission, he has purchased scales and incurred other expenses,—such as enlarging a building with which they were to be connected,—for the purpose of preparing them for use. Id.

3. The use by a firm of a privilege granted to one member to place scales in a street, where it was granted with the knowledge and expectation that it was to be used by the firm, is no ground for revoking the privilege. Id.

4. A well in a city street, abandoned by a former owner of the land, may be fitted up and maintained for public use by the municipal authorities, without the consent of the abutting owner. Loebtutter v. Aurora (Ind.) 259

5. A public pump in a city street is not a nuisance to an abutting lot owner, when maintained by the city authorities. Id.

6. A telegraph wire across a highway, hanging so low as to cause an injury to a traveler, is a defect for which the town is liable, if it had, or ought to have had, notice thereof. Hayes v. Hyde Park (Mass.) 249

7. The co-operation of the act of a traveler who is not guilty of negligence or any wrongful act, with a defect in a highway, in causing an injury to another traveler, will not relieve the town from liability. Id.

HOMESTEAD.

1. Real estate held by husband and wife jointly as tenants by entireties is subject to the right of homestead exemption, under Tenn. Code, § 2985, exempting real estate belonging to the head of a family to the amount of $1,000; and the right may be claimed by the wife after a decree of divorce by which she is given the homestead. Shelton v. Orr (Tenn.) 514

2. A tenant in common has no homestead right in the premises, under Tenn. Code, § 2985, exempting "a homestead or real estate in the possession of or belonging to each head of the family," and § 2986, giving each head of the family the right to elect where the "exemption shall be set apart, whether living on the same or not." Joyce v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. (Tenn.) 519

3. A separate building used for business purposes, and a stable used for hotel purposes, on the same lot with a hotel which is exempt as a family homestead, are not part of the homestead. Cass County Bank v. Weber (Iowa) 477

4. The homestead exemption extends to the entire building used both for a family residence and a hotel, where no rooms used exclusively for hotel purposes could be used without passing through rooms occupied by the family, and the rooms used for the office and bar-room, sitting and dining room, were also in common use by the family. Id.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. See also CONTRACTS, 27.

1. A void contract by a married woman to leave to an adopted child all her property at death cannot be ratified after she becomes sole. Austin v. Davis (Ind.) 120

2. A marriage between a man and a woman who had a husband then living is absolutely void without a decree, under W. Va. Code 1860, chap. 109, § 1, and confers no right to alimony. Stewart v. Vandervoort (W. Va.) 50

3. A marriage void in toto at the time it is made cannot be made valid by a subsequent statute, so as to impose upon the husband the burden of alimony. Id.

4. Connivance of a husband in his wife's adultery is not shown, where he already suspects her to be guilty, by merely suffering her in a single instance to avail herself of an opportunity therefor which she has already arranged without his knowledge, even though he purposely refrains from warning her because he hopes to obtain evidence which will entitle him to a divorce. Wilson v. Wilson (Mass.) 524

5. Statutory prohibition to remarry within a certain time after divorce has no force out of the State in which the decree is granted. Phillips v. Madrid (Me.) 862

6. The Maine statute prohibiting the guilty party in a divorce suit to remarry applies only to divorces granted by the courts in that State. Id.

ICE.

1. The same rights exist in ice upon a stream that exist in the waters of the stream. Brown v. Cunningham (Iowa) 583

2. Ice on an unnavigable stream which was meandered in the government survey, and the ice of which has never been transferred by the United States, may be cut and property therein acquired by any person who can get access to it without trespassing upon the lands of riparian owners. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Ice; on river, common right to use or take; rights of riparian owner; on private waters; sale of, by parol. 583

INFANTS.

1. An infant's board bill while attending school is included among the necessities for which he may be compelled to pay. Kilgore v. Rich (Me.) 859

2. One who pays an infant's debt for necessities, at the infant's request, has a good cause of action against him for the reasonable value of such necessities. Id.

3. A child of tender years may be a trespasser and be subject to the consequences of his trespass. Rodgers v. Lees (Pa.) 216

4. A letter by the grantee in a deed, soon after coming of age, demanding, without qualification or condition, the repayment of money which he had paid, on the sole ground that he was a minor at the time of the purchase, although claiming that he was morally justified, under the circumstances, in repudiating the trade,—is a sufficient disaffirmance of the purchase. McCarty v. Woodstock Iron Co. (Ala.) 136

5. Disaffirmance of a deed by the grantee on coming of age, because of his infancy at the time of the purchase, does not, proprio vigore, divest him of the legal title and reinvest it in the grantor. Id.

6. Disaffirmance of a deed by the grantee on coming of age, because of his infancy when it was made, is conclusive; and he cannot thereafter affirm it without the other party's consent, although no other action has been taken by either party to restore the other to his original condition by transfer of the title or consideration. Id.

INJUNCTION. See also ELECTRICAL USES AND APPLIANCES, 1; TRIAL, 1.

1. An injunction may be issued to restrain the publication and circulation of posters, circulars, etc., for carrying out a conspiracy to boycott the complainant. Casey v. Cincinnati Typographical Union No. 3 (C. C. S. D. Ohio) 193

2. Upon the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction, the rules of evidence are applied less strictly than upon the final hearing of the cause; and consequently evidence that would not be competent in support of an application for a perpetual injunction may be admitted. Id.

3. The cutting down of trees on a boundary line by one of the common owners may be enjoined at the suit of the other. Musch v. Burkhardt (Iowa) 484

4. That one owner has cut down and appropriated part of the trees on a boundary line will not defeat his right by injunction to prevent the other owner from cutting down the remainder. Id.

5. Courts of equity should proceed with great caution in abating or restraining a factory as a nuisance by injunction, and not enjoin unless the fact of nuisance is made in some way to appear clearly beyond all ground of fair questioning. Powell v. Bentley & G. Furniture Co. (W. Va.) 58

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Injunction; against cotenant; in partition suit; as to water right. 484

INNKEEPERS.

An innkeeper is not liable for the theft of a valise left by a transient guest who has paid his bill and gone away, although it was checked for him by a porter, where the latter had no authority to check it, and no other person at the hotel had any notice that the valise was left. Glenn v. Jackson (Ala.) 882

Innkeeper; responsibility as bailee; for what property; for property lost or stolen; when not liable; relation of guest and host must exist; who is guest; mere depositary. 882

INSANE PERSONS. See also DEFINITIONS, 2, 3.

1. The power of a court to restore to capacity, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1766, persons adjudged insane or incompetent, is applicable only to incompetent persons for whom guardians have been appointed under § 1764. Kellogg v. Cochran (Cal.) 104

2. A person committed to an insane asylum is restored to his legal capacity to sue, by his discharge from the asylum by the resident physician, in accordance with the California statutes (Cal. Pol. Code, § 2197; Cal. Act March 9, 1885; Dear Pol. Code, p. 850). Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Insane persons; conclusiveness of adjudication as to insanity. 104

INSOLVENCY.

1. A confession of judgment, made in contemplation of a general assignment for creditors which immediately follows, must be treated as part of the assignment in respect to prohibited preferences. Berger v. Varrolmann (N. Y.) 808

2. The lack of the knowledge of a creditor on receiving a confession of judgment, that his debtor intends immediately to make a general assignment, does not exempt the judgment from the provisions of the New York statute in respect to preferences in such assignments. Id.

INSURANCE. See also CONTRACTS, 1.

1. An incorporated association for the purpose of obtaining employment for its members while living, and to render pecuniary assistance in a stated amount to the families of deceased members by assessments upon the survivors, is a life insurance company within the meaning of Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 368. Brown v. Balfour (Minn.) 873

2. An association engaging in the business of life insurance must be treated to that extent as a mutual benefit association. Brace v. Chartrand (Colo.) 209

3. A policy of life insurance will be construed, so far as possible, as a will. Id.

4. Life insurance payable to the wife of the insured upon his death, and in case of her death to his children, is vested in her if she survives him, and becomes a part of her estate although she dies before obtaining the money; and her estate will not go to his children. Id.

5. A claim that deafness is a bodily infirmity which is covered by a representation by an applicant for accident insurance that he is free from bodily infirmities is deemed to have been waived where the insurer's agent, by personal observation, knew or had abundant opportunity to know the extent of applicant's deafness, before the application was signed, notwithstanding a provision in the policy that the company's agents shall have no power to waive its conditions. Follett v. United States Mut. Acci. Assn. (N. C.) 815

6. No part of the fund set apart or appropriated in accordance with the rules, regulations, and by-laws of either of the societies or associations enumerated in Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 34, § 368, or by any society or association similar thereto (§ 369), to be paid over to the family of a deceased member (unless the amount exceeds the sum of $5,000), can be seized or appropriated by legal process to satisfy a debt due from a member of the family, or from the society or organization itself. Brown v. Balfour (Minn.) 873

7. An option of the insurer to refund premiums paid, with interest, or pay the amount of the policy on the life of one who died by his own hand while insane, according to the equities of the case, is not waived by failure to make it within sixty days allowed after proofs of loss for payment, if it is made within a reasonable time. *Salentine v. ## INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

1. One who furnishes drinks to members of a club as tenants in common, from intoxicating liquors which they have given him to hold for them, on payment to him of the cost price, which he uses to replenish the stock, makes a sale of intoxicating liquors, within the meaning of a statute requiring a license for such sales. State v. Neis (N. C.) 419

2. Written authority required by statute from the parent or guardian for selling or furnishing intoxicating liquors to a minor must be special for each occasion. A general permit or license for the minor to drink beer and whiskey in a specified bar-room, without limitation as to time or quantity, is void and will not justify even one sale. Gill v. State (Ga.) 433

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Intoxicating liquors; sale by social club. 419

Sale to minor. 433

JOINT TENANTS AND TENANTS IN COMMON. See also HOMESTEAD, 2; TREES.

A tenant in common may be liable for conversion in wrenching and carrying away machinery from a mill, against his cotenant's protest. Waller v. Bowling (N. C.) 261

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Joint tenants and tenants in common; liability of tenant in common to action of trover; exclusive possession of property; destruction, loss, or conversion of property; refusal to permit division or severance; sale of property by one of tenants; misuse of property; permanently changing form; trover against cotenant. 261

JUDGMENT. See also EVIDENCE, 11, 16; NAME.

1. In judgment by confession, a statement of the facts out of which the confessed indebtedness arose is sufficient if it contains enough to enable creditors and others to investigate the bona fides of the judgment. Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank (Minn.) 741

2. The order of commitment of a person to an insane asylum is not conclusive evidence against him, in an action for the malicious prosecution of him as an insane person. Kellogg v. Cochran (Cal.) 104

3. A judgment for a penalty, with an assessment of damages, so far as they have accrued, leaving future damages to be recovered by after process of scire facias, is required in an action on a penal bond by Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 82, § 82, where the liability of the party in the bond is a continuing liability, as in the case of a bond given in bastardy proceedings; but such a judgment is not required by that Act in an 12 L. R. A.

action on a bond conditioned to pay a single sum on a day certain, because in such case there can be but one breach and one assessment. Corson v. Dunlap (Me.) 90

4. A motion to vacate what purports to be a judgment, but which is a nullity because of lack of jurisdiction, may be granted even after the term in which the entry is made. American Freshhold Land & Mortg. Co. v. Thomas (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 681

5. A ruling on a demurrer does not bind the court to follow it in deciding whether or not the facts proved as alleged in the petition demurred to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Brown v. Cunningham (Iowa) 583

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

1. An entry under a parol agreement to lease a room for a year, provided the lessor obtains a renewal of the ground lease, does not create a tenancy from year to year, but only a tenancy at will, although the ground lease is obtained, where no written lease of the room is accepted or tendered. Childers v. Lee (N. M.) 67

2. Permitting a stairway carpet with holes in it to remain on the stairs of a tenement-house, with notice of its condition, renders the owner liable for injuries to a tenant from a fall caused by catching her foot in one of the holes. Pell v. Reinhart (N. Y.) 843

3. The election of a lessor who is in the actual possession of the premises, to forfeit an oil and gas lease for default of the lessee, may be regarded as a constructive entry under his title. Ray v. Western Pennsylvania Natural Gas Co. (Pa.) 290

4. A lessee cannot set up his own default as a defense to an action for money due by him on the lease, on the ground of a forfeiture created by such default. Id.

5. A landlord's lien on crops for rent, under Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 80, can give him no right to maintain a personal action for damages against a bona fide purchaser from the tenant, although he may follow the goods and distrain for his rent. Finney v. Harding (Ill.) 605

6. Title to the hay, oats, and straw, is not reserved to the owner of a farm as against attaching creditors of a tenant, under a lease by which the tenant agrees to raise enough stuff to feed the stock of the place, or, if he fails to do so, buy what may be necessary. *Coleville v. 1. The words "teamster or other laborer" who "habitually earns his living" with a horse or team, in the Iowa Code, which makes such horse or team exempt, include one whose business is to sell oil which he delivers, for the most part, by a tank wagon usually driven by his boy, although a few sales are made and the oil delivered at a room where it is stored. Consolidated Tank-Line Co. v. Hunt (Iowa) 476

2. The residuary interest or estate of the grantor in land conveyed in trust to pay certain charges and debts is subject to the lien of an attachment or judgment and to sale on execution. Atwater v. Manchester Sav. Bank (Minn.) 741

LICENSE. See also HACKS; HIGHWAYS, 3, 3.

1. A vested right cannot be acquired in a license granted under an ordinance that gives or reserves the power to revoke it. Child v. Bemus (R. I.) 57

2. The power to revoke licenses in his discretion, conferred on the mayor by the common council of a city, is not unreasonable or oppressive, though exercised without his giving notice to the licensee. Id.

LIENS. See also LANDLORD AND TENANT, 5.

1. A mechanics' lien on a public corporation is not authorized by Pa. Act April 7, 1870, providing for the sale of the property and franchises of a corporation on execution. Guest v. Lower Merion Water Co. (Pa.) 324

2. A water company is a public corporation exempt from mechanics' liens, where it is bound to furnish water at reasonable rates and after twenty years to transfer its works to a municipality at 10 per cent above cost less dividends received, if required to do so, and which is protected from competition until it is able to declare an 8 per cent dividend. Id.

3. A laborer or materialman is entitled to a lien against the property paramount to the vendor's lien, where a vendee of lands, under a contract of sale containing a stipulation that he shall construct a building upon the premises, erects a building thereon, but the labor performed and material furnished are not fully paid for. *Bohn Mfg. ### MANDAMUS.

1. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a judge to act in proceedings, where he has improperly refused on the ground of supposed disqualification. Ex parte Alabama State Bar Assn. (Ala.) 184

2. A writ of mandamus is properly directed to a corporation in its corporate name. State, Grady, v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. (Wis.) 180

3. Mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a railroad company to perform its statutory duty to make a farm crossing. Id.

4. Actions for penalties for the refusal of a railroad company to make a farm crossing do not constitute such an adequate remedy at law as to bar a writ of mandamus to compel the construction of a crossing. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Mandamus; to compel performance of corporate duties. 180

MARK. See DEED, 2.

MARSHALING.

The principle that a person having two funds to satisfy his demand should not by his election disappoint a party having but one fund applies to a mortgagee omitted by mistake from condemnation proceedings, and who has a right either to foreclose upon the land or take the money paid for condemnation; and while the money is in the hands of the court he may be compelled to accept it before resorting to the land, where his right is saved to contest the sufficiency of the compensation assessed in the condemnation proceedings to which he was not a party. Calumet River R. Co. v. Brown (Ill.) 84

MASTER AND SERVANT. See also CARRIERS, 7, 8; SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM.

1. If work may be well done by unskilled and inexperienced persons, a master is not negligent in respect to his duty to other employes by employing them. Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (Ala.) 283

2. The danger of flying molten iron when a boiler of iron is punctured should be pointed out to employes working in a trench into which the iron would flow if a wall of earth was punctured, and who would be instantly enveloped by the flying metal if it should be thrown out. Id.

3. A master need not instruct his employes as to an open and unobscured danger from a boiler of iron so situated that the melted iron would flow into the trench where the men are working, if a wall of earth between the trench and the boiler was broken through. Id.

4. A failure to make proper rules or establish a proper method for the conduct of his business will make the master liable for injuries to his servant, caused by improper or negligent conduct of the work by coemployes, which the observation of a proper and sufficient rule would have prevented. Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 454

5. A general rule that freight is to be safely loaded so that it cannot fall off the cars is not sufficient as a rule for loading timber above the sides of the car, so as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injury to a servant by the fall of timber from a gondola car on which it was piled above the sides without stakes to hold it, although stakes were furnished by the company to be used in the discretion of its servants. Id.

6. An employe is not bound by a rule that the regular compensation for services covers all risks, and that remaining in the service will be considered an acceptance of such condition of employment, where he has not expressly agreed to the rule. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Dooly (Ga.) 343

7. A brakeman assumes the risk on account of a highway bridge over the track, which is so low that he cannot pass under it while standing erect on top of a car, where he knows the facts as to the bridge and continues in the employment. Williamson v. Newport News & M. V. Co. (W. Va.) 297

8. A servant is not justified in assuming 12 L. R. A.

that a car furnished his employer by a railroad company is in good repair and supplied with proper brakes, if he knows that other cars so furnished have many of them been defective. Roddy v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 748

9. A railroad company which has contracted to furnish cars for stone at a quarry is not liable to a servant of the other party to the contract for injuries resulting from any breach of duty arising purely under the contract; but if it was charged with the duty of selecting the cars, it is liable to such servant for injuries resulting from a failure to use ordinary care to provide cars which are reasonably safe. Id.

10. Running a freight train without a cow-catcher attached to the engine is negligence which will entitle an employe to recover for injuries occasioned by derailment of the train in running over a cow. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. v. Kyle (Ala.) 103

11. An employe struck by brick from a falling wall, while standing on a platform helping to put ice in a brick building, in consequence of which he was knocked or fell to the ground, is not guilty of contributory negligence which will defeat a recovery for his injuries because, in violation of his orders, he had left the part of the platform which had a railing and gone to a part which had none, and on which he had been warned not to stand on account of the danger of falling, where he had no warning of any danger from the wall, and his injuries, though chiefly caused by his fall, would have been greater if he had not fallen out of the way of the brick. Smithwick v. Hall & U. Co. (Conn.) 279

12. The proximate cause of an injury sustained by an employe in walking to find shelter, because of the employer's failure of duty to furnish him transportation from the place to which he had been sent to repair a wrecked car,—is the neglect of the employer. Schumaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 257

13. Failure of duty to furnish an employe who has been sent out to repair a wrecked car, transportation to some place where he can procure food and shelter, for which he is compelled to walk 9 miles in the night, in cold and dangerous weather, renders the railroad company liable for injuries thereby sustained. Id.

14. The negligence of the foreman of a gang in failing to block a pile which was shoved against a servant, injuring him, because it was not blocked, is the negligence of a fellow servant, although the foreman had authority to employ and discharge him and had control of him in doing the work. Ell v. Northern P. R. Co. (N. D.) 97

15. Whether a negligent servant is a fellow servant of an employe who is injured by his negligence depends, not on their relative rank, but on the character of the work the negligence with respect to which resulted in the injury. Id.

16. The negligence of another servant engaged in the same general business with the injured servant is the negligence of a fellow servant, whatever position the former occupies with respect to the latter, as to all acts which pertain to the duties of a mere servant as con-tradistinguished from the duties of the master to his employes. Id.

17. Street-railroad companies are not liable for willful and tortious acts of their servants committed outside of the scope of their employment. Lafitte v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. (La.) 387

Lessees having a right merely to quarry stone on the premises, which is a mere incorporeal hereditament, are under no implied obligation to protect the premises from trespassers, and are therefore not entitled, on that ground, to recover as owners for the conversion of the stone by trespassers. Baker v. Hart (N. Y.) 60

2. A lease giving the sole and exclusive right to quarry stone on certain lands for a term of years does not transfer the land, or make the lessees owners of any stone which they do not actually quarry out and sever from the land, or entitle them to recover as owners for the conversion of stone quarried and taken away by trespassers, although they are entitled to the damages sustained by invasion of their exclusive right. Id.

A mutual mistake of covenantor and covenantee in supposing that land staked and pointed out to the grantee all belonged to the grantor, while in fact it included a strip belonging to an adjoining owner whose land was made a boundary by the description of the premises in the deed, entitles the grantee to have the deed reformed so as to include such strip, and then to damages for breach of the 12 L. R. A.

covenant of warranty and seisin for failure of title to such strip. Butler v. Burnes (Conn.) 278

MONEY.

A reservation of the ground rent in "Spanish milled silver dollars," without specifying their weight or fineness, at a time when they were legal tender by Act of Congress, is presumed to be for the benefit of the owner of the rent; and a tender of such dollars for the rent is good, even after Congress has demonetized them and Spain has ceased to coin them and provided for their withdrawal, substituting a new coinage, the use of which is obligatory. *Johnson v. #### MONEY IN COURT.

1. Money in the hands of a county treasurer for a person entitled to the compensation paid in condemnation proceedings may be withheld by injunction from the owner of the premises, where a mortgagee has been omitted by mistake from the condemnation proceedings; and a decree may be made for the application thereof upon the mortgage, saving the mortgagee's right to contest the sufficiency of the amount. Calumet River R. Co. v. Brown (Ill.) 84

2. A distributee's share of money in the custody of a clerk of court after final decree and order of distribution, if nothing remains to be done except to pay over the money, is a "debt" of record and subject to garnishment by a creditor of the distributee, although money in custody of the court cannot, as a general rule, be reached by garnishment. *Dunsmoor v. 2. A mortgage is not invalid as to the amount of the debt actually due, in the absence of fraud, because it is made, without the mortgagor's knowledge, for more than the amount of the debt. Id.

3. Delivery of a mortgage by the mortgagor, for record at his own expense, a few hours before he killed himself, may constitute a good delivery to the mortgagee, although the latter had no knowledge of the instrument until after the mortgagor's death. Id.

2. Negligence in blasting for the construction of a schoolhouse, the work being purely for the benefit of the public, cannot create any liability against a city unless by force of some statute. Howard v. Worcester (Mass.) 160

3. Only that part of a bridge across a navigable river which is above high-water mark can be taxed by a municipal corporation in Arkansas, although one half of the bridge is within the county in which the municipality is situated. Pt. Smith & V. B. Bridge Co. v. Hawkins (Ark.) 487 stored; and he is liable for failure to do so, if anyone is injured by its fall. St. Louis, L. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hopkins (Ark.) 189

3. A contractor, after completing and delivering possession of a building and its acceptance by the owner, is not liable to a stranger to the contract for injuries resulting from defects in the construction of the building. Curtin v. Somerset (Pa.) 323

4. A car with defective brakes is not such an imminently dangerous instrument as to make the owner liable, for the simple act of leaving it upon the track, to one who is injured by it, if he has no contractual or other relation to the owner. Roddy v. Missouri P. R. Co. (Mo.) 746

5. A millowner is not liable for injury to a boy who was a trespasser, by a fall from a ball and chain used for hoisting material, where the boy got upon it while it was in motion produced in some way, only a moment after it had been stopped and hung up out of reach, and not left carelessly dangling in condition to move. Rodgers v. Lees (Pa.) 216

6. A boy six or seven years old, who gets upon a ball attached to a chain used as a hoisting apparatus for a mill, while it is in motion, for the express purpose of riding up on it, although warned by a companion not to do it, is chargeable with the consequences of his recklessness, and no recovery can be had for his death by falling. Id.

7. An act or omission that merely increases or adds to the extent of a loss or injury will not have the effect of contributory negligence to defeat a recovery, though it will affect the amount of damages. Smithwick v. Hall & U. Co. (Conn.) 279

8. A negligent act or omission, to constitute contributory negligence, must operate as a proximate cause of the injury, or one of the proximate causes, and not merely as a condition. Id.

2. The noise of a factory, which materially interferes with and impairs the ordinary physical comfort of human existence, may be treated as a nuisance. Id.

3. Deposits of coal slack, dirt, and refuse, by a mining company upon its own lands, in a place from which they are washed down, polluting a stream and injuring the lands of other persons, render the company liable for the damages, if the deposits were made intentionally and the result might have been anticipated by persons of ordinary intelligence and prudence, although they were made without malice and upon the only feasible place or places in which the company could make them and carry on its business of mining coal. Columbus & H. State, Lacour (Tex.) 864

3. A mere intruder who, without color of authority, simply assumes to act as an officer, is not an officer de facto, where the public know or ought to know that he is an usurper; and his acts are absolutely void for all purposes. State, Van Amringe, v. Taylor (N. C.) 202

PARTNERSHIP. See also CORPORATIONS, 19.

1. Money loaned to a surviving partner for the express purpose of paying the debts of the firm, and so used, creates a valid claim in equity against the assets of the firm, and may be treated as such in a subsequent assignment for creditors of the firm, although the firm was in fact insolvent at the time of the loan, where this fact was not known either by the lender or the survivor. Durant v. Pierson (N. Y.) 146

2. Individual creditors of one partner have the exclusive right to the satisfaction of their debts out of his separate property, in the same 12 L. R. A.

way that partnership creditors have the right to payment from the firm property; and until such primary claims are satisfied in either case, neither class of creditors is entitled to any share of the fund thus primarily devoted to the other class of debts. Hundley v. Farris (Mo.) 254

PATENTS.

1. A new result produced by a combination of old elements must be due to their co-operative action; they must so act that each qualifies every other. If they act independently, or if one acts independently of the others, it is an aggregation, and not a patentable combination. National Progress Bunching-Mach. Co. v. John R. Williams Co. (C. C. S. D. N. Y.) 107

2. A combination, to be patentable, must not only be new, but it must produce a new result, or an old result in a better form. Id.

3. A patent for a cigar bunching-machine which consists of a combination of old elements, one of which is a "bunch receiver" or receptacle which performs no function except to hold the bunch after it is finished, instead of letting it fall to the floor or into a box or into the hand of the operator, is invalid because there is only an aggregation of the parts, and not a combination, the function of the other parts being entirely independent of the bunch receiver. Id.

4. An unusually specific description of the parts in a claim for a combination of elements all of which are old, where the patent is only for an improvement upon prior machines, cannot be broadened by construction so as to cover the use of a combination which leaves out some of the elements described. Id.

2. A peddler, within a legislative description which includes those who sell and deliver wares from house to house, need not be personally interested in the sales, but may work on a salary. Re Wilson (D. C.) 624

PLEADING.

1. The omission of a prayer for process is amendable, and is waived by appearance and pleading. Lyons v. Planters Loan & Sav. Bank (Ga.) 155

2. Where the material fact in controversy is only the existence of a debt, the judge may decree the appropriate equitable relief under the allegations of the pleadings and the admissions of the answer, upon a verdict of the jury finding in favor of the plaintiff, so much for principal and so much for interest. Id.

3. Demurring generally to the plaintiff's petition is pleading to the merits. After appearance at the first term, and demurring generally at a subsequent term, it is too late to raise the question of service, by motion or otherwise. Id.

4. In a suit by a vendor for a rescission of a contract for the sale of real estate, on account of a failure to pay the purchase money, the complaint must allege that he has tendered to the vendee a valid deed conveying to him all the land according to the terms of the agreement, and demanded performance on the part of the vendee. Frink v. Thomas (Or.) 239

5. A plea puis darrein continuance is sufficient to set up a defense that defendant has been garnished in another suit as trustee of the plaintiff. Smith v. Carroll (R. I.) 801

6. Allegations of a petition for an injunction, that the right and liberty of contracting with reference to its business is denied to the petitioner, and that its property is therefore taken from it without its consent, and that it is compelled to enter into involuntary, unreasonable, and unprofitable contracts,—do not amount to allegations of facts, but to mere statements of conclusions, and are not, therefore, admitted by a motion to dissolve the injunction. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 486

7. Waiver as a defense for nonperformance of a contract must be pleaded. Freeland v. Rits (Mass.) 561

PLEDGE AND COLLATERAL SECURITY.

1. Collateral security given by the maker of a note "for the payment of this note or any of my liabilities, . . . due or to become due," gives an indorser of such note no right to a preference in the application of the proceeds of such security to such note as against other notes not 12 L. R. A.

indorsed by him. Fall River Nat. Bank v. Slade (Mass.) 181

2. The rights of an indorser as to the application of collateral security given by the maker to the holder of a note are to be determined by the terms of the pledge as they exist at the time of the sale of the security, and are not affected by pledges formerly made to secure different notes, in a series of renewals of which the present note is the last. Id.

1. Where an efficient adequate cause for injuries has been found, it must be considered as the true cause, unless another, not incident to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened. Schumaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 257

2. The narrowness of a bridge and the insufficiency of its railings are not the proximate cause of an injury to an occupant of a cutter dragged off the bridge by a horse which fell and broke the railing in consequence of disease or choking by the harness. McClain v. Garden Grove (Iowa) 483

3. Negligence of the engineer of a donkey engine operated on a track used in connection with a furnace, which caused a collision with a railroad train where the tracks crossed, is the proximate cause of injuries to a passenger on the train, received in a collision at a second crossing, where the rear coach of the train was derailed in the first collision and the train came to a full stop on the second crossing, where it was struck by the donkey engine, from which, after reversing it and shutting off the steam, the engineer and fireman had jumped before the first collision, but which started again at once, the throttle being reopened by the jar of the collision or otherwise, and ran into the train on the second crossing. *Bunting v. 1. The title to works of public improvement need not be given to cities or towns by the Legislature, in order to subject them to the expense of such works. Re Kingman (Mass.) 417

2. Cities and towns are not exempted from the power of the Legislature to subject them to the burden of assessments for local improvements, by the fact that the improvements are of such general public utility that the Legislature might lawfully pay the expense thereof with money of the State. Id.

3. The disposal of sewage from a number of cities and towns containing one sixth of the population of the State is a matter of general public utility for which the Legislature can properly appropriate money from the state treasury. Id.

4. The Legislature can delegate to commissioners to be appointed by a court the power to determine the proportions of expense to be paid by different counties, towns, or cities for a local improvement. Id.

5. No rule need be laid down by the Legislature for the guidance of commissioners in making an apportionment among cities and towns, subject to acceptance by a court, of the expense of a system of sewage disposal, other 12 J. R. A.

than to direct them to determine it as they shall deem just and equitable, where the State Constitution gives power to make "all manner of wholesome orders, laws," etc., not repugnant thereto. Id.

6. Benefit to property is not the only consideration to be regarded in apportioning among cities and towns the expense of a system of sewage disposal, but there are many elements to be considered, some of which are the exigencies or special need of such improvements, the area to be accommodated, the present or probable population and wealth, the value of the land, and its adaptability for homes and other uses. Id.

7. An express exemption of church property from taxation does not extend by implication to assessments for street improvements. Atlanta v. First Presby. Church (Ga.) 859

8. Property occupied by a church and used only for church purposes and religious worship is not exempt from assessments for improvements to a street on which it abuts, under a statute authorizing such assessments to be made on abutting property. Id.

An ordinance prohibiting second-hand clothing to be brought into or offered for sale within a town, without first proving that it did not come from a place where contagion or infection is or has been prevailing, is unreasonable and void in the absence of any epidemic or other apparent necessity therefor. Kosciusko v. Stomberg (Miss.) 528

1. It is no excuse for failure to stop a railroad train within 100 feet of a place where the track crosses another railroad, as required by statute, that the rear of the train would thus be left standing across another track. Birmingham Mineral R. Co. v. Jacobs (Ala.) 830

2. When a railroad train breaks in two, leaving servants of the company on the rear section, which is permitted to continue on its way by force of gravitation, the company owes the duty, even to persons trespassing on its tracks, to station lookouts in such positions on the moving cars that they can watch the tracks ahead of them and warn persons thereon of their danger, a neglect of which may render the company liable for the injuries caused thereby. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (Tenn.) 184

3. Negligence of a railroad company in failing to use proper appliances and employ competent servants, which results in the breaking in two of a moving train, will not warrant a recovery against it by one who, after waiting for the first section of the train to pass him, and without observing the approach of the other section, steps on to the track in front of it and is injured. Such negligence is not the proximate cause of the injury. Id.

2. The record of a deed is not complete, so as to constitute constructive notice of its existence, under Wash. Sess. Laws 1869, pp. 818-819, §§ 18, 19, 24, until it is filed, recorded, and entered in the index book in the manner required by those sections. Bitchie v. Griffiths (Wash.) 384

3. A recording officer who fails to record a deed delivered to him by the grantee for record is not to be considered as the agent of subsequent bona fide purchasers, but as the agent of the grantee; and in such case the rule applies that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer, the misfortune must rest on the person in whose business and under whose control it happened and who had it in his power to avert it. Id.

2. On a sale reserving title until all payments are made, retaking possession under express provision of the contract for default in payment of installments does not rescind the contract, or excuse performance by the purchaser, or entitle him to a return, either of the installments already paid or of his unpaid purchase-money notes. Tufts v. D'Arcambal (Mich.) 446

3. On an exchange by husband and wife of his wagon for her sleigh, which were both kept, before and after, in a barn leased by him, there is no such change of possession as will uphold her title to the wagon against the husband's creditors. Wheeler v. Selden (Vt.) 600

4. An express warranty of soundness is made by a bill of sale of horses, which describes them as "sound and kind," especially where the buyer had not the peculiar means which the seller possessed of knowing the facts. Hobart v. Young (Vt.) 693

1. Equity can enforce an agreement when the remedy at law would be inadequate for inability to give a conditional or modified judgment, or to preserve the benefit of the agreement to all parties interested. Bumgardner v. Leavitt (W. Va.) 776

2. Where specific performance would be granted to the purchaser if he were to apply, the seller is entitled to like relief on the ground of mutuality of right and remedy. Id.

3. Specific execution of a contract for shares of stock may be enforced when they have a unique and special value to the purchaser, and the loss cannot be adequately compensated by damages at law. Id.

4. The modification of a contract in details by common understanding and mutual consent will not defeat a right to specific performance, if it is still clear what the rights of the parties are under the contract as modified. Gloucester Isinglass & G. Co. v. Russia Cement Co. (Mass.) 533

5. The specific performance of a contract to deliver fish skins may be compelled on the ground that damages for failure to perform would be irreparable, where both parties are engaged in manufacturing the skins into glue, and complainant would be able to procure them elsewhere and thus continue its business, only with great difficulty, if at all. Id.

STATUTES. See also COURTS, 9.

1. A statute which applies only to a limited number of counties, although not local or special for the reason that it applies to all of a certain class created by the Constitution itself, is not impliedly repealed by a general statute without negative words. Egmer v. Luzerna County (Pa.) 192

2. By application of the maxim ejusdem generis, which is only an illustration of specific application of the broader maxim noscitur a sociis, general and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning, being associated together, take color from each other so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general; but the rule does not require the entire rejection of the general terms. Misch v. Russell (Ill.) 125

3. A statute must be construed as prospective in operation, except where the intent that it shall operate retrospectively is expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, or is necessarily implied from its language, which would be inoperative otherwise than retrospectively. Stewart v. Vandervoort (W. Va.) 50

4. The most satisfactory and conclusive test of the question whether the provisions of a statute are mandatory or directory is whether the prescribed mode of action is of the essence of the thing to be accomplished; in other words, whether it relates to matters material or immaterial, to matters of convenience or of substance. Gallup v. Smith (Conn.) 353

5. Where a statute is susceptible of conflicting and doubtful construction, that construction should be adopted which supports it in all its parts. Burlington, O. R. & N. R. Co. v. Dey (Iowa) 436

1. The right to coal and minerals in their natural state can be severed from the ownership of the land by a contract, so as to subject such property to taxation. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Baker (Ill.) 247

2. The separation, for purposes of taxation, of coal or other minerals from the ownership of the land, is not prohibited by Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 120, requiring real property containing minerals to be valued at the price for which it would sell, including the minerals. Id.

3. In assessing that part of a telegraph "line" in any town, for taxes, under N. Y. Laws 1886, chap. 659, providing for its assessment in the same manner as lands of residents, its value as part of a telegraph line in operation is not to be considered,—especially since a tax on the business and franchises of the company is provided for by another statute; but the property actually in the town—such as the wires, poles, and interest and easement in the land occupied—is to be assessed at its full value. People, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dolan (N. Y.) 251

4. The "capital stock" of a corporation liable to taxation under N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 456, § 3, is the actual capital owned by the corporation, and not the shares of stock. People, Union Trust Co. v. Coleman (N. Y.) 763

5. Assessors have no discretion to take the value of the shares of stock of a corporation as that of its capital stock, where they know the value of the latter. Id.

6. Personal property of a nonresident, invested or habitually kept within the State, is subject to the collateral-inheritance tax imposed by N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 718, § 1, on property of a resident which passes by will or by the intestate laws of the State, or, if the decedent was a nonresident, on property "within the State." Re Romaine (N. Y.) 401

7. A certificate by the register of unpaid taxes, that he finds none against certain land, is conclusive in favor of one who purchases it in reliance upon the certificate. Philadelphia v. Baxter (Pa.) 751

8. The holder of a tax certificate, who redeems the land from a subsequent tax sale to the county, which is void because of a double assessment, all taxes due having been paid by the landowner, may recover back the money paid the county for such redemption. Clapp v. Pinegrove Twp. (Pa.) 618

TRIAL. See also EVIDENCE, 14; JUDGMENT, 5.

1. An injunction by a federal court against illegal combinations in restraint of interstate commerce, although they are made misdemeanors, does not violate the provisions of U. S. Const. requiring the trial of crimes to be by jury. United States v. Jellico Mountain Coke & O. Co. (C. C. M. D. Tenn.) 753

2. A stipulation in a note, that the entire amount shall be due after thirty days' default in payment of interest, creates a condition precedent to an action brought before the date named for the maturity of the principal, and prevents a trial without a jury, as provided by Ga. Const. § 4, ¶ 7, Ga. Code, 5145, in case of "unconditional contracts," where an issuable defense is not filed under oath or information. American Freehold Land & Mortg. Co. v. Thomas (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 681

3. Failure to demand a jury is a waiver of the right to a jury trial. Haley v. Bureau County Bank (Nev.) 815

4. Improper argument by defendant's counsel, by making statements outside the evidence as to his client's good character, will not justify the State's counsel in arguing, against defendant's objection, that his failure to offer proof of good character raises an inference that his character was not good. Bennett v. State (Ga.) 449

5. The question of proximate cause is ordinarily one of fact for the jury. Sokumaker v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (Minn.) 267

6. But it is for the court where the facts are not in dispute. Bunting v. Hogsett (Pa.) 268

7. Whether terms of art were used in their ordinary meaning or not, in a contract between men familiar with the business to which the terms relate, cannot be left to the jury, although they may determine the meaning of the terms in that business. Crauford v. Oman & S. Stone Co. (S. C.) 375

8. An instruction that there is proof that plaintiff was suffering from Bright's disease, and that it was a dangerous disease and should be taken into consideration in determining his expectation of life and loss of earning power, in a suit for personal injuries, is proper where there is testimony of medical experts that he is suffering from that disease, with little, if any, evidence to the contrary. Bunting v. Hogsett (Pa.) 268

9. The jury must determine whether or not a person was guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent his recovering damages from a railroad company for injuries received while he was walking upon its tracks, where he had left the track to allow a train to overtake and pass him, and then returned to it in front of a section of the train which had become detached and was following the first section by the force of gravitation, the approach of which he failed to discover because he was crossing a bridge over a waterfall, the noise of which prevented his hearing the approaching train. Patton v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (Tenn.) 184

10. The fall of a tenant in a tenement-house, caused by a hole in a stair carpet, does not, as matter of law, show contributory negligence, although she knew of the holes in the carpet and the stairway was well lighted at the time. Peil v. Reinhardt (N. Y.) 843

11. The breach of an injunction bond requires the question of a right to recover at least nominal damages thereon, to be submitted to the jury. Brown v. Cunningham (Iowa) 588

12. An instruction that a railroad bed is in a defective condition when it is not reasonably safe for the passage of trains over it need not be qualified by reference to other railroads in the State. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Dooly (Ga.) 843

TRUSTS. See also COVENANT, 2.

1. A trust is created by a letter from an uncle to a nephew who had written claiming a sum of money, acknowledging that the nephew had earned it and saying, "I had the money in the bank, the day you were twenty-one years old, that I intended for you;" and, "I don't intend to interfere with the money in any way until I think you are capable of taking care of it;" then adding in a postscript, "You can consider the money on interest." Hamer v. Sidway (N. Y.) 463

2. A declaration of trust, made in consideration of a conveyance of land, although at a later date, is valid and irrevocable, and cannot be limited or affected by subsequent acts or contracts of the trustee with a stranger to the parties named in the instrument. McArthur v. Gordon (N. Y.) 667

3. The liability of a trustee who, in consideration of a deed, has charged property with a trust for the support of an incompetent person, cannot be avoided by transferring the property charged with such support; but he is liable for such part of the expense thereof, if not furnished by his grantee, as cannot be recovered from the land itself or from a second grantee. Id.

4. It is the duty of a trustee to exercise a supervision over the care and comfort of an incompetent person for whose support, in consideration of the conveyance of a farm, he has made a declaration of trust to appropriate the net rents of the farm or the interest on its price if sold; and he should apply the proceeds, so far as necessary to that purpose, wherever, within reasonable limits, such person may be cared for and supported. Id.

5. Under a statute providing for the subjection of beneficial interests to the payment of the beneficiary's debts, if a fund is devised to trustees with directions to pay the income to testator's son during his life, free from the claims of creditors, and with further directions that if a court of last resort shall at any time determine that the income is liable to be subjected to the payment of the son's debts then the trustees shall pay it to the son's wife for her separate use, income which accrues prior to a decision by a court of last resort authorizing the application is applicable to the payment of the son's debts, but not that which accrues after such decision. *Bull v. #### USURY.

A stipulation in a deed of trust to secure notes and interest coupons, that in default of any payment the whole sum of the principal shall become due at the lender's option, is to be construed as a penalty, and will not be enforced except upon cancelling unearned interest notes, and therefore it does not make the contract usurious. Dugan v. Lewis (Tex.) 93

VENDOR AND PURCHASER. See also ESTOPPEL, 1, 2; REAL PROPERTY, 3.

1. The loss by fire of a house on land in the actual possession of a vendee as owner, he having secured part of the purchase money by mortgage and paid the balance, must be borne by him, although he holds under a defective deed, as he is the equitable owner of the premises. Weteler v. Duffy (Wis.) 178

2. Upon the correction by the court of a deed which defectively describes premises the equitable title to which is in the vendee, his legal title relates back to its execution and delivery. Id.

3. Where the vendee has paid part of the purchase money and given his notes for the balance, before the vendor can rescind the contract he must return or offer to return the money paid, with legal interest, less reasonable rental value of the premises if the vendee has been in possession, and also all unpaid notes. *Frink v. VOTERS AND ELECTIONS. See also COURTS, 10; ESTOPPEL, 6.

1. An election is not valid, although conducted fairly and honestly, if the statutory provisions and rules are not substantially observed. State, Van Amringe, v. Taylor (N. C.) 203

2. An election held by a mere usurper of the office of registrar, who had fraudulently obtained the books and set up his claim to the office for the first time on election day, when the lawful registrar publicly demanded the return of the books, is void. Id.

3. A statute providing that a tie vote may be determined by lot does not violate a constitutional provision that all elections shall be by ballot. Johnston v. State, Sefton (Ind.) 235

4. A candidate nominated independently by the requisite number of voters, under Md. Code Gen. Laws, § 181, who has also been nominated by a party convention, is entitled by implication to another place on the official ballot, in addition to that in the group of candidates of the political party which has nominated him in convention. Fisher v. Dudley (Md.) 538

5. A political party the name of which can be placed on ballots, under the Connecticut election law, is formed where a republican caucus votes to adjourn for the organization of a citizens' caucus, and thereupon some democrats unite with the republicans present and nominate a citizens' ticket which is voted at a town meeting, although no committees are appointed or any steps taken to effect a permanent organization. Fields v. Osborne (Conn.) 551

6. The use of the word "for," before the name of each office named in a ballot, does not invalidate the ballot, under Conn. Pub. Acts 1889, chap. 247, § 1, prohibiting any words thereon except the official indorsement, the names of candidates, the office voted for, and the name of the political party. Id.

7. Ballots cast at a town meeting, which include the name of a candidate for judge of probate, who can be legally elected only at a state election, or which have the words "and ex officio registrar of births, marriages, and deaths," added to the name of the office of town clerk, are invalid under Conn. Pub. Acts 1889, chap. 247, § 1, which provides that ballots shall contain, in addition to the official indorsement, only the "names of the candidates, the office voted for, and the name of the political party." Id.

8. An elector may lawfully vote for the same man as a candidate for two incompatible offices, at the same election. Misch v. Russell (Ill.) 125

9. The term "canvass," in Dak. Comp. Laws, § 1489, requiring notice of a contest of election within twenty days after canvass of the votes, includes a decision by lot of a tie vote, as provided by S. D. Laws 1890, chap. 84, § 26; and notice within twenty days after such 12 L. R. A.

decision is sufficient. Bouler v. Eisenhood (S. D.) 705

1. A riparian proprietor on the shore of the sea or its arm has no right, as against the State or its grantees, to extend wharves in front of his land below high-water mark. Eisenbach v. Hatfield (Wash.) 633

2. Under Wash. Const. art. 15, providing for the appointment of a commissioner to establish harbor lines, and the leasing of the right to build wharves, no right to build them beyond high-water mark can be claimed by a riparian proprietor, even if he would have such right at common law. Id.

3. The right to a dock between low-water mark and the channel of Acushnet River may be reserved under Mass. Acts 1806, chap. 18, authorizing owners to build and extend

1. The connection of a delusion with a will must be made manifest and shown to have influenced its provisions, before the will can be set aside and declared void because of it. Potter v. Jones (Or.) 161

2. An unworthy motive for disinheriting a child by will, whether pride or aversion, spite or prejudice, if it is not resolvable into mental perversion, will not affect the validity of a will. Id.

3. The lack of testatrix's signature at the end of an instrument written by her own hand and containing her own name at the beginning is not supplied by her statement that the instrument is her will, and a request to a subscribing witness to sign it. Re Booth's Will (N. Y.) 452

4. The "then heirs" of a person to whom an estate is given if he is not living on the death of another are to be ascertained as of the moment of the latter's death. Proctor v. Clark (Mass.) 731

5. A gift of the residue of testator's property to children of a sister and of a deceased brother, to be equally divided, limited by a codicil "to the children of the first generation," gives nothing to the children of a nephew who died before the will was made, under R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 182, § 14, giving the share of a deceased devisee or legatee to his descendants. Almy v. Jones (R. I.) 414

6. A direction that the executor pay the debts of a testator out of his real or personal estate is a charge of debts upon lands, creating a trust which creditors can enforce by compelling the executor to execute the trust. Morse v. Hackensack Sav. Bank (N. J.) 62

7. The shares of children who are not mentioned in the will of their father, and who are entitled by statute to the same shares in his estate "as if he had died intestate," are not affected by a power of sale contained in the will. Smith v. Olmstead (Cal.) 46

8. The residuary estate must bear the whole loss caused to the beneficiaries by the widow's election to take against the will, and cannot share it with specific legacies if there remains enough to pay the latter, unless there is a plain intention in the will that the residuary legatee is a preferred object of testator's bounty. Re Vane's Estate (Pa.) 227

9. The election of a widow to take against 12 L. R. A.

the will is equivalent to her death, as respects the payment of legacies and the distribution of that part of the estate which is distributed under the will. Id.

10. A receipt for money advanced by a testatrix, to be deducted from a legacy in a will of a certain date, does not authorize any deduction from a legacy of the same amount in a subsequent will. Jaques v. Swasey (Mass.) 566

11. Legal incapacity of a legatee to perform a condition on which the gift is made will prevent it from taking effect, although the time for performance was subsequent thereto. Bulard v. Shirley (Mass.) 110
